In asserting this claim, George Dummer, esq. her son-in-law, on her behalf, tendered, in January 1837, to Cornelius W. Lawrence, esq. then mayor of the city of New York, forty thousand dollars in full discharge of principal and interest due upon the above mentioned mortgage, and demanded a conveyance of the island to Mrs. Bell by the corporation. The tender and demand were rejected—and Mrs. Bell, by James W. White, her solicitor, filed a bill in chancery against the corporation, setting forth her rights as above, and praying for relief, &c. The corporation appeared by Robert Emmett, esq. and, in October, 1838, the cause was referred by the chancellor for a hearing and decision to the honorable Charles H. Ruggles, vice chancellor of the second circuit. On the 7th day of June last the case was argued before vice chancellor Ruggles, at Poughkeepsie, by Samuel Sherwood and David B. Ogden, esquires for Mrs. Bell, and by Robert Emmett and Daniel Lord, jr. esquires, on the part of the corporation; and since then the vice chancellor has, with his accustomed promptitude, given a decision in the cause in favor of Mrs. Bell's claim, accompanied by the exceedingly able and learned opinion upon the important principles of law and equity involved in the case.

EARLY COMMERCE OF AMERICA. Interesting facts. The first decked vessel ever built within the limits of the old U. States, was constructed on the banks of the Hudson, by Adrian Block, in the summer of 1614. She was called a yacht, and her first voyage was made through Hell Gate, into the sound, and as far east as Cape Cod, by the Vineyard passage. It was in this voyage that Block Island was discovered.

Within the first 46 years after the settlement of Massachusetts, there were built in Boston and its vicinity, 730 vessels varying from 6 to 250 tons burthen. One of these, the Blessing of the Bay, a bark of 30 tons, was built in 1631. The celebrated English patriot and divine Hugh Peters, caused a vessel of 300 tons to be constructed at Salem, in 1641. The first schooner ever launched is said to have been built at Cape Ann, 1714.

In 1714, Connecticut had but 2 briggs, 20 sloops and a few smaller craft, employing but 120 seamen; while Massachusetts, about the same time, had 462 vessels, the tonnage of which was 23,406, and employed 2,493 seamen.

The first ensign ever shown was by a regular man-of-war; it was hoisted on board the frigate Alfred, in the Delaware, by the hands of Paul Jones, in the latter part of December, 1775. What this ensign was is not precisely known, as the present national colors were not formally adopted until 1777.

The first regular American cruiser that went to sea was the Lexington, a little brig of 14 guns, commanded by captain John Barry, of Philadelphia. She sailed sometime in the winter of 1775. The first American man-of-war that got to sea after the adoption of our present form of government, was the Ganges. She was originally an Indianan, but was purchased by the government, and converted into a cruiser, having an armament of 24 guns.

She sailed in May, 1793, under command of captain Richard Dale, who was first lieutenant of the Bon Homme Richard, when that ship captured the Serapis. The Constellation was the first of the new built vessels that went to sea, under captain Truxton. She sailed in June 1793, and was followed by the United States, and a little later by the Constitution, both these latter sailing in July the same year.

The first prize under our present naval organization was the French privateer La Crocodile. She was a schooner of 14 guns, and was captured by the sloop-of-war Delaware, capt. Decatur. The above historical facts we have gathered from Mr. Cooper's excellent naval history of the United States.

THE FIRST METHODIST CHURCH. The N. Y. Tatler states, that the first Methodist church erected in America, was built in 1776, in John street, in that city, and is still occupied by that body. When the above church was erected there were but about 1,109 Methodists in this country. At the present moment they number 700,000 members.—They have upwards of 3,000 ministers, 5,000 local and itinerant preachers.

BATTLE OF PRINCETON. The following touching account of that engagement, is extracted from an unpublished work by Mr. Custis, of Virginia, entitled "private memoirs of Washington."

The heroic devotion of Washington on the field of Princeton is matter of history. We have often enjoyed a touching reminiscence of that ever memorable event from the late col. Fitzgerald, who was aid to the chief, and who never related the story of his general's danger, and almost miraculous preservation, without adding to his tale the homage of a tear.

The aid de-camp had been ordered to bring up the troops from the rear of the column, when he had under general Mercer became engaged. Upon returning to the spot where he had left the commander-in-chief, he was no longer there, and upon looking around, he discovered him endeavoring to rally the line which had been thrown into disorder by a rapid onset of the foe. Washington, after several ineffectual efforts to restore the fortunes of the fight, is seen to rein up his horse, with his head to the enemy, and, in that position, to become immovable. It was a last appeal to his soldiers, and seemed to say, will you give up your general to the foe? Such an appeal was not made in vain. The discomfited Americans rally on the instant, and form into line; the enemy halt, and dress their lines; the American chief is between the adverse posts, as though he had been placed there, a target for both. The arms of both lines are levelled. Can escape from death be possible? Fitzgerald, horror-struck at the danger of his beloved commander, dropped at the reins upon his horse's neck, and drew his hat over his face, that he might not see him die. A roar of musketry succeeds, and then a shout. It was the shout of victory. The aid-de-camp ventures to raise his eyes, and oh, glorious sight, the enemy are broken and flying, while dimly amid the glimpses of the smoke is seen the chief, "alive, unharmed, and without a wound," waving his hat, and cheering his comrades to the pursuit.

Col. Fitzgerald, celebrated as one of the finest horsemen in the American army, now dashed his rovels in his charger's flanks, and heedless of the dead and dying in his way, flew to the side of his chief, exclaiming, "Thank God! your excellency is safe," while the favorite aid, a gallant and warm hearted son of Erin, a man of bows and sinews, and "a little maddened in the melting mood," gave loose to his feelings, and wept like a child for joy.

Washington, ever calm amid scenes of the greatest excitement, affectionately grasped the hand of his aid and friend, and then ordered, "away, my dear colonel, and bring up the troops—the day is our own!"

ANCIENT HISTORY OF THE ROSE. Among both the Greeks and Romans, some attention appears to have been paid to the cultivation of flowers as offerings or as ornaments; as offerings in the temples of their deities, and as ornaments on occasion of public or private festivity. The Romans, however, appear to have esteemed flowers more than the Grecians, and the origin of this greater regard for them may not improbably be found in the imitation of that luxury and splendor which the Romans had witnessed in eastern countries. The rose is mentioned by Homer and Anacreon; by the former, in the hymn to Ceres; by the latter, in many of his odes; through which we learn that it was a flower remarkable for the beauty of its petals; that it grew amid thorns; that it had a divine fragrance; was the color of the human complexion; that it was the most beautiful of all flowers, "the queen of flowers," the "flower of love." According to the Calendar of Natural Occurrences in Greece, the rose blossomed in March; the rosa græca, or lychnis coronaria, in May. In the Roman Calendar we find early roses were in blossom in April, and that in May they were generally in flower. In Egypt, according to Theophrastus, the rose blossomed two months before it appeared in Italy, and continued in flower for almost as long a time in the former country, after it had ceased blooming in Italy. In the latter country it succeeded the blossoming of the violet and the lily.

BRUSSELS LACE. How few, if there be any, of our lady readers, who know, or knowing, think and ponder on the penurious condition of the poor women who manufacture the "genuine brussels," treasures of which are sometimes so ostentatiously displayed by those to whom they have been transmitted from generation to generation, the lace being more valuable as it grows older. Perhaps the following extract from a letter from an intelligent correspondent of the N. Y. Star, may convey information of which such readers may not perhaps be possessed. Writing from Brussels, he says: "The carpet trade, once so famous here, has ceased to be anything extraordinary. The manufacture of tapistry has also gone out, like the snuff of a candle. Lace, such as is equalled no where, continues to be abundantly made.—I went over the principal manufactory lately. It is the property of Mons. Dupetiaux, and is in a street (I forget the name) near the cathedral. Young women are almost wholly employed, and appear to be most wretchedly paid, though their work brings high prices. At least the clerk who showed me through the concern, pointed out a box for donations, for these young women, and told me, when I inquired, that a small deposit in it would be of value to them.—The price of the lace, and the people was worth the five franc piece I dropped in. The clerk smiled and said "the people of Brussels, the ladies and gentlemen, only give a few francs." The young women make lace edgings and sprigs, which others of their work upon net for loupes, rippets, borders, veils, &c.

BRITISH POST OFFICE. The New York Evening Post publishes the subjoined letter from a friend in Birmingham, England, in referring to Rowland Hill's plan for the reduction of postage:

"You will see that our new post office plan is pretty well decided on; indeed, I am told that one of the covers has already been seen in this neighborhood as a curiosity. These covers are to be stamped and sold at one penny each, and when not containing above a certain weight—I believe half an ounce—will go free to any part of the country. It is a grand scheme truly, and, it seems to me, its moral effect will be great. I only fear for the faith of our faithless and fickle ministry in carrying it out. Our political changes, by the bye, will have amused you. Who says now a queen of England is nobody? A king may be so, as the ladies will have it. Perhaps, however, the power of the queen will prove a power rather in show than in substance, for it does not seem likely that the ministers can keep their places. I was much amused to see, the other day, a long article in one of your daily papers on our post office scheme, ascribing the invention to the rev. Rowland Hill, of blessed memory; and then the editor, to get over the difficulties of his theory, very cleverly adds that 'it did not attract much attention during that great man's life,' &c. The truth is that Mr. Rowland Hill, the inventor of this, is now living. He proposed his scheme only two years ago, and is as different from the parson as I am."

The Post adds:

The prodigious reduction which thus takes place in the rates of postage in England, amounting to several hundred per cent. shows how cheaply the people of that country might have had their letters conveyed hitherto, had the mails been left to private enterprise, and how heavy a tax they have paid for making them a concern of government.

FOREIGN NEWS.

TWENTY-FOUR DAYS LATER.

The packet ships Ontario, capt. Hutleson, from London, and the Independence, captain Nye, from Liverpool, arrived at New York, on Saturday 11 29th ult. the first with London dates to May 23, and the second with Liverpool papers to the 26th May; and on Sunday, (noon) the 30th, the steamer ship Liverpool, capt. Bayler, came up with Liverpool post papers of the 13th ult.—and with letters from all parts of the old world. The Liverpool had rough weather, and contrary winds, which has somewhat prolonged her voyage. The political news is not at all remarkable, though there is much news of general interest, particularly the commercial.

Though the news by the Liverpool is over three weeks later than we have had, yet the political news is without interest.

Of the harvest, high expectations were entertained, and the import of grain had, for the present ceased, and, with that, the export of bullion. The stock of the latter, however, in the vaults of the bank, had been reduced to about four millions sterling, and money was still scarce in London.

Mr. Shaw Levevre had been chosen speaker of the house of commons, by the very meagre majority of 18, over his rival competitor, Mr. Goulburn. The numbers were 219 to 201.

We subjoin the brief and sensible acknowledgment made by the newly elected speaker, in the hope that some of our verbose public men may profit by it:

"I venture to offer my sincere and heartfelt acknowledgments for the distinguished honor you have conferred upon me. I wish your election had fallen upon an individual more worthy of the honor.—I assure you I will endeavor, by an honest and impartial discharge of my duties, to deserve the high distinction I have received at your hands." (Cheers.)

On Tuesday, Mr. Shaw Levevre, attended by his mover, seconder and a large body of members, appeared at the bar of the house of lords. Mr. Levevre stated, in the usual form, that the common had elected him to the office of speaker; and to his honor the speaker, in the usual complimentary strain, signified "the majesty's royal approbation and allowance" of him as speaker. On his return to the house of commons, Mr. Levevre stated what had passed in the lords.

The state of England was less disturbed. The Morning Chronicle, referring to the chartists' meeting, has this paragraph:

The simultaneous meetings of the chartists have every where turned out a decided failure. Kersa moor meeting was to have been attended by 500,000 and was to lead to the most astounding results; we have seen various accounts of the meeting, and its highest estimate of the number is that of the Manchester Courier, which estimates the number present "at most 15,000"—other accounts estimate the number variously from 5,000 to 10,000. The Birmingham Journal says of the meeting in that town, "it was a miserable failure." The Sunderland Herald says of the meeting on the town moor of the same name, that the men, women and children present were but about 10,000, but that the chartists were at no time more than four hundred; the rest being "like ourselves, amused spectators of a somewhat diverting comedy, got up to gratify the vanity of small number of political performers."

It is asserted, however, that the ministry have a confidence in their majority in the house of commons, and that a dissolution might probably be resorted to.

From Spain, there are the usual quantity of murder, arson and brigandism, in all of which there is but little that is novel.

The demand for first rate vessels for the N. York trade is represented as very great. According to the Liverpool Albion, the export of British manufactures to the United States is now brisk; the Liverpool packets get quite full, and the Virginia, which sailed last, refused goods; the transatlantic ship, Control, of Charleston, and the Troy, are announced. The first Baltimore spring ship will convey out 1,400 tons measurement goods, and the Philadelphia packet of the 8th has more goods than she can take.

The demand for American securities has been limited. United States bank shares are 237. 1/2. to 237. 1/2. 6d.

The arrival of Mr. Webster with his family in London (at the Brunswick hotel) is announced. London papers of the 4th June. We cordially welcome, says the London Gazette, to our shores this great and good man; and accept him as a fit representative of all the great and good qualities of our transatlantic brethren.

From the London Times, June 4.

The usual average returns of the liabilities and assets of the bank of England, embracing the pe-from the 5th of March to the 23th ult. which appeared in last night's Gazette, gives the following result, viz: that the average of the month ending 23d ult. as compared with the average of the month ending the 5th of March, shows a decrease of the circulation of £ 498,000, a decrease in the deposits of £ 879,000, and a decrease in the stock of bullion of £ 2,712,000. Wherefore it appears the decrease in the liabilities is £ 1,257,000, this represents the decrease in the total quantity of money, in the month ending the 23th ult. as compared with the month ending the 5th of March, so far as regards the administration of the currency by the Bank of England.

The yearly comparison is as follows:—The average of the month ending the 26th of June, 1838, is a decrease in the circulation of £ 1,011,000, a decrease in the deposits of £ 2,358,000, and a decrease in the stock of bullion of £ 5,475,000. Wherefore it appears that the decrease in the liabilities is £ 2,393,000, and this represents the decrease in the total quantity of money in the month ending the 13th ult. as compared with the month ending the 26th of June, 1838, in so far as regards the administration of the currency by the Bank of England. The variations in the stock of bullion have taken place in the following manner and proportions:—In the month ending the 19th of September, as compared with the month ending the 5th of June, 1833, there is a decrease

In the month ending the 11th of December, as compared with the month ending the 13th of September, 1833, there is an increase of

69,000

In the month ending the 5th of March, 1839, as compared with the month ending the 11th of December, 1833, there is a decrease of

2,439,000

In the month ending the 23th ult. as compared with the month ending the 5th of March, there is a decrease of which leaves upon balance a decrease of £ 475,000. The changes and fluctuations in the circulation appear from the following statement:—In the month ending the 13th of September, as compared with the month ending the 26th of June, 1833, there is an increase of

£ 552,000

In the month ending the 11th of December, as compared with the month ending the 13th of September, there is a decrease of 1,293,000

In the month ending the 5th of March, 1839, as compared with the month ending the 11th of December, 1833, there is an increase of 138,000

In the month ending the 27th ult. as compared with the month ending the 5th of March, there is a decrease of which leaves upon balance a decrease of £ 11,000. The following are the changes and fluctuations which have taken place in the deposits:—In the month ending the 13th of September, as compared with the month ending the 26th of June, 1833, there is a decrease of

408,000

£ 774,000

In the month ending the 11th of December, as compared with the month ending the 13th of September, there is an increase of

252,000

In the month ending the 5th of March, 1839, as compared with the month ending the 11th of December, 1833, there is a decrease of

957,000

In the month ending the 23th ult. as compared with the month ending the 5th of March, there is a decrease of which leaves upon balance a decrease of £ 333,000.

The following are the average amounts of the circulation, the deposits, and the stock of bullion, for the period from the 26th of June, 1833, to the 11th ult. inclusive:—

Circulation £ 13,662,000
Deposits 9,209,000
Bullion 8,951,000

The first thing to be observed in the present report of the above is an analysis, it is the continued decrease of the stock of bullion, which began in the month of August last, with the single exception of the return in 11th of November, it has continued without intermission to the present moment.

The following is a statement of the progress of the decrease in the average of the month ending the 13th of August, 1833, as compared with the average of the month ending the 29th of May, is 9,000, and this taking place in twelve weeks, the mean decrease is 750, per week.

The decrease in the month ending the 13th of September, as compared with the month ending the 26th of June, is 233,000, which is a mean decrease of 37,750, per week.

The decrease in the month ending the 16th of October, as compared with the month ending the 21th of July, is 331,000, which is a mean decrease of 44,500, per week.

The decrease in the month ending the 13th of November, as compared with the month ending the 21st of August, is 294,000, which is a mean decrease of 24,000, per week.

In the month ending the 11th Dec. as compared with the month ending the 18th Sept. there is an increase of 69,000.

The decrease in the month ending the 8th Jan. as compared with the month ending the 16th of October, is 78,000, which is a mean decrease of 6,500, per week.

The decrease in the month ending the 5th of February, as compared with the month ending the 13th of Nov. is 1,251,000, which is a mean decrease of 104,250, per week.

The decrease in the month ending the 5th of March, as compared with the month ending the 11th of Dec. is 2,439,000, which is a mean decrease of 203,250, per week.

The decrease in the month ending the 2d of April, as compared with the month ending the 8th of January, is 3,099,000, which is a mean decrease of 258,250, per week.

The decrease in the month ending the 30th of April, as compared with the month ending the 5th of Feb. is 3,150,000, which is a mean decrease of 262,500, per week.

And the decrease in the month ending the 28th ult. as compared with the month ending the 5th of March is 2,712,000, which is a mean decrease of 226,000, per week.

The present stock of bullion in the coffers of the bank is about 4,000,000, rather under than over.—Of this stock probably 500,000, consists of silver, which leaves 3,500,000, in gold against liabilities to the extent of upwards of 26,000,000, and therefore the proportion which the gold bears to the liabilities is about 2s. 6d. in the pound. This state of things requires no comment. It has arisen partly from the nature of our system of currency, and partly from the gross misconduct of the bank directors, and which is most palpable; for by the return of the 11th December last, the average of the securities held by the bank from the preceding three months was 20,707,000, whereas since that period the amount has been regularly increasing, till on the 5th of March it had reached the sum of 23,513,000, which is an increase of 2,806,000.

Now, on the 11th of December last, the average amount of bullion held by the bank during the preceding three months was 9,362,000, while by the return of the 23th ult. the three months average is diminished to 5,119,000, and so that in the face of an enormous decrease of 4,243,000, in the stock of bullion; the bank directors have been actively engaged in the manufacture of 2,336,000, of paper money; all which is repugnant to sound principles and in direct violation of the principle laid down by the directors themselves, in 1832.

The matter so standing, it should now seem that three circumstances most concur to retrieve things into their original integrity, and extricate the bank from its perilous situation:

1. A continuance of fine weather and a good harvest, so that we may not require a further importation of corn.

2. An increased exportation of British produce and manufactures.

3. Favorable news from the United States of America as to the state of their money market.

Failing in these things, it is to be feared, that in order to avert their impending difficulties, the bank directors will have recourse to a series of miserable shifts and expedients, and which, without adding to their stock of disgrace (which by the by is impossible) will inflict serious injuries on the community.

The condition of the Bank of France is in singular contrast with that of England, for instead of about eight millions sterling, which is its usual supply of coin, it had in its vaults in the beginning of June eighteen millions sterling, an accumulation useless in itself, and injurious to others, but occasioned mainly by the depressed condition of French trade.

If the pressure for money had not in some degree abated, it was understood, so says the Morning Chronicle, which is supposed to speak with knowledge on the subject, that an arrangement would have been effected between the two banks, by which the Bank of France would have advanced to the Bank of England a large sum in gold. This is precedent for such a proceeding, as it was stated by lord Ashburton (Alexander Baring), that the Bank of France once supported the Bank of England through one of their most pressing exigencies by a liberal advance of gold.

The arrival, however, of a million of dollars from Mexico, and the expectation of another million close at hand, together with the stock of exports of metal to the continent, had rendered such a recourse unnecessary—33, in any event, it must, we suppose, be unpalatable to the Bank of England.

From the London Morning Herald.
On several occasions lately we have had but too touch occasion to refer to the distressed position of the manufacturing districts, particularly those wherein cotton-spinning is carried on, and also to the causes which have induced the Bank of England, as well as other banking establishments, to put the screw upon the discount market. In confirmation of what we have lately advanced upon this subject we take the following extract from the Manchester advertiser—a generally well informed paper, and in this instance, from its locality, likely so to be:

"Most of the mills are working short time, and many have stopped altogether. The numbers of poor operatives who are daily begging their bread in the streets, and calling from warehouse to warehouse, or daily on the increase, and present really a sad and heart-rending appearance. The number of persons in Lancashire upon half work and out of work, who have been employed in labor branching out or dependent upon the manufacture of cotton, cannot be less than from eight hundred thousand to one million of souls. Where this is to end with the present high price—and future prospect of the high price—of bread, presents a question of a really frightful nature. The banks are pulling up their customers in all directions; and letters of a peremptory nature, requesting balances to be forthwith paid up, are going in all directions. We regret the spinners and manufacturers should have brought this entirely upon themselves. Ten hours' labour four years ago, would have prevented all this evil, and all the future evil to themselves, and all the misery and hunger to their distressed and offending operatives."

We fear that this picture of the existing state of the districts to which we have referred is by no means overdrawn, and it affords a sad contrast to the prosperity statements of the government organs: thus proving as it were, that the government itself was perfectly indifferent to the matter. We had occasion also in the course of last week, to refer to the reasons which had induced the bank to elap the screw upon the money market, to which the same journal has referred, and to which the following illustration of the mode by which the late artificial traffic, or rather gambling, in cotton wool has been carried on:

"A large number of cotton brokers and others connected with them in Liverpool have long pursued a practice to enable them to speculate in cottons in the face of a rising market, to the great injury of the spinner and manufacturer, by means of drawing upon each other. John Doe says to Richard Roe—Richard, do you buy a thousand bales of cotton, draw upon me, and get the bill discounted through your bankers; I will do the same, and draw upon you, and get the bill discounted through my bankers; and in three or four months (the date of such bill so accommodated) they each sell their cottons at considerable advance without having out of one single baling, and which they have done with £ 40,000 invested in mills and machinery, has to pay for. This has been done from time to time, to a very great extent, particularly so in March and April last, and which bills are falling due in June and July. How they are to be met at this time, with a fall of 2d. per lb. from the highest point, we leave our readers to determine for themselves. These bills having been paid into different banks for discount, the secret remained snug enough until now, when the pressure in the money market forces most of the banks to seek for discounts from the great leviathan depot in Threadneedle street, where they no doubt discovered the game of the crossing of paper, giving the parties presenting them the gentle proof of having to discount. These bills, then, we are persuaded, a portion of the ones referred to in the Morning Herald. The Bank of England having raised the rate of discount to five per cent. it has been followed up by the Bank of Ireland adopting the same thing. It need not be added, that five per cent. means discounting no bills that are not direct from London."

Thus we have the money market of the whole country deranged by a surreptitious and most reprehensible mode of speculation; which by merchants of the old school would have been thought very much akin to swindling. The mischief, however, we fear, is not over; much, and great, indeed, will be the sacrifices that may be made if the concoctors of such bills have not the honesty to attempt to take them up. The result may be solved in the compass of a nut-shell—that is, it may be safely asserted that no commercial country can long prosper when such disgraceful means are adopted to force speculations and to bolster up our markets. We believe, also, that the statements of the shortness of the cotton crops in the United States are wholly unworthy of credit, and that they are put forth with the sole view of forcing this market into an unnatural degree of speculation."

From the London Times, June 10.

It is understood in the city that Mr. Jaudon is about to quit the country, and that the agency established here for the United States bank is about to be given up. From the fact that it may be pronounced a failure, and though it acquired a specious appearance of permanency while issues were large and paper abundant, it was foreseen by many that the first change in the market would be very likely to seal its fate. What the Bank of England refused to do in 1837 for houses of the highest credit in London, they were not likely to do for an individual who could acquire no credit in his own person, and whose bills were liable to the fatal objection of being drawn by principal upon agent, which is applied alike, under the strict commercial rule, to the highest and to the lowest names. That of Mr. Jaudon added nothing to the security of the instrument, while the draughts heretofore of the Bank of the United States upon individual merchants always acquired thereby some increase of credit, and sometimes the acquiescence quite as good as the drawer. Mr. Jaudon has therefore been disappointed in a great measure of those facilities on which he had reckoned, and in providing for his obligations as they became due, must have had to pay a price for it calculated to diminish greatly the profit of his general account. At the very outset no man could be in a more false position than he was. In the bank parlor he was looked at with distrust, his account refused, and the merchants universally felt angry and insulted at his presuming to interfere in transactions which belonged to their peculiar province. A new agency, certainly not of American origin, must now be appointed, and matters revert to their old channel. The experiment is not to be considered, however, as wholly thrown away; it will form a very useful lesson to all parties.

[The Times is very poor authority on American affairs.]

American slavers—Plymouth. The Pylades, sloop of war, has arrived from Africa. She brings important intelligence from the coast respecting the slave trade, a new system having sprung up for the purpose of eluding the vigilance of our cruisers, under the protection of the American flag. It appears that American vessels are taken to the Havana, and sold together with their papers, for employment in the nefarious slave traffic; they are there manned by regular slave crews, and sailed under American colors. Two of these vessels have lately been captured by the English cruisers, and so complete were their American credentials, that, in the absence of any representative from the United States to Sierra Leone, the commanders have sent them under charge of a man of war to New York, in order that the circumstances may be investigated by the American government, and their assistance obtained to put a stop to such practices. The Pylades has lost but one man on the coast; she brings, however, distressing accounts from some of the other ships, among whom the loss of life has been most serious, both of officers and men.

Attempt of an insane man to enter Buckingham palace. On Monday night a most daring attempt was made by an insane man to gain admission into the interior of Buckingham palace, when the police and military fortunately interfered. It appears that about nine o'clock on Monday night, the sentry on duty in that part of the garden which is immediately beneath the terrace of the north wing of the palace, heard a rustling among the shrubs, and saw a man emerge from them, and immediately prepare to ascend the steps of the terrace. The sentry called out to him, when the man answered, it is all right, and the soldier seeing that he was dressed as a laboring man, conjectured that he was employed either in the garden or kitchen. The man accordingly walked on up the steps and having reached the terrace, passed some paces towards a glass door which leads into the interior of the palace, when he was noticed by one of the ladies' maids—who was sitting near the door, and who upon seeing him, screamed out to the soldier to seize him as he was a stranger, and from his singular and ferocious appearance she imagined he meant harm. The soldier immediately secured him, and intelligence of the occurrence having been forwarded to the police on duty at the palace, inspector Russel was immediately on the spot, and the man was delivered over to him. The prisoner then began to use most horrid language, called the queen by every opprobrious term that he could at the moment think of, and repeatedly said his intention was to have killed her majesty, "he had come there for no other purpose." Amongst the expressions made use of by him was one that "no Protestant queen ought to sit upon the throne of England." The prisoner, who is a middle-aged man, and apparently of great strength, used great resistance, but after much trouble the inspector succeeded in getting him clear of the palace, and into the bird-cage walk, where he became so violent that inspector Russel, who was unassisted, was forced to handcuff him, and afterwards obtain a file of the guard at the Wellington barracks to assist him to convey the prisoner to the station house in Gardner's lane. All the way there, and after his arrival, he continued applying epithets to the queen totally unfit for publication, and several times lamented that he had not killed her. It being evident the man was mad, his actions were watched all night, during the major part of which he continued raving. Next morning a private examination of the prisoner took place before sir Frederick Roc, as chief magistrate, at the home office, and after a sentence embracing the facts detailed in this paper, and he was remanded, in order that he might be visited by experienced surgeons, and his connections inquired of, the prisoner having refused to state who or what he was. At the conclusion of the examination the prisoner was taken to Tottill-fields, Bridewell. Upon searching the prisoner at the station house no dangerous weapon was found.

The Liverpool steam ship.

Liverpool, June 3, 1839.

To John Pollock, esq. secretary of the Transatlantic Steam Ship company, Liverpool.

Sir: The undersigned passengers (several of them with their families) in the transatlantic steam ship Liverpool on her late trip from New York to this port, adopt this mode of signifying their sense of obligation as well to the proprietors, whose enterprise and public spirit have afforded this mode of conveyance, as to captain Fayer, commander of the ship, for the great attention and kindness uniformly exhibited by him during the voyage. They also wish to express their approbation of the skill and diligence of the officers and engineers, and the good conduct of all doing duty on board.

The Liverpool left Sandy Hook on Saturday, May 18th, at 5 o'clock, P. M. and took the pilot for this harbor at 5 o'clock, A. M.—thus making the passage from the discharge of one pilot to the taking of the other in 14 days and 7 hours. For a considerable part of the voyage the ship experienced an almost entire calm, and for most of the residue, head winds of greater or less strength. She is steady, commodious, and appears to the undersigned to be well suited to the service in which she is engaged. Indeed they suppose it hardly possible for the Atlantic ocean to be traversed with more certainty, as to time, less risk, and less change from the ordinary habits of life, than by the use of her.

Thanks to capt. Fayer, leave him their cordial good wishes, and tender, through you, their respects to the proprietors. DANIEL WEBSTER, and all the other passengers on board.

May 21st, 113 emigrants from Bohemia, for New York, consisting in part of agricultural laborers, but chiefly mechanics, arrived at Hull, in the Severn from Hamburg, under the care of Mr. Phillipson, with whom they departed on Tuesday morning for Liverpool. The intended line of packet ships between Hull and New York will prevent the necessity of large numbers of emigrants having to pass through Hull to Liverpool to obtain shipping for New York, for they will sail direct from that port in the Hull shipping company liners. So says the Eastern Counties Herald.

The Paris Monitor announces that the ratification of the treaty between his majesty, the king of the French, and her majesty, the queen of Great Britain and Ireland, for the transmission via France of the correspondence of the latter kingdom with the East Indies.

Died, May 18, at Florence, the countess de Lipona, ex-queen of Naples. She died in the arms of her brother, the count de Montfort, and his daughter, the countess de Rasponi. The ex-queen sunk under the same disease that destroyed her brother, the emperor Napoleon, and their father, cancer in the stomach. She was delirious with occasional lucid intervals, during the last fifteen hours. The two sons of the countess de Lipona are in the United States, where they are practising as barristers, and their absence from her is said to have greatly increased the bitterness of her last moments. It will be remembered, that, last year, French chambers voted an annual income of 100,000*l.* to the countess as a compensation support. The countess was born the 26th Mar 1782, and was, therefore, in her 58th year.

In answer to S. Canning, June 5, lord Palmerston stated "that the last despatches which he received from our minister at Buenos Ayres, dated the 21st February, and at that time the blockade of the straits continued. He could state that her majesty's government had been unremitting in the exercise of their friendly offices, both at Paris, Buenos Ayres, in order to bring about an amicable adjustment of the matters in dispute."

The tea trade. The tea trade has been brisk. Last week the deliveries amounted to 431,228 (lbs.) At the public sale of 30,869 packages, (1,933 lbs.) which commenced to-day, the attendance the trade was but limited, but though it went heavily, prices were not lower.

We understand that on his recent departure from London his excellency, Richid pasha, the Ottoman minister, presented to Miss Pardee, the well known author of "The City of the Sultan," a farewell of the most costly perfumes, antiques, amulets, and other eastern objects of luxury, tastefully arranged in a handkerchief of pink gauze, and tied with violet colored ribbons. [Morning Post.]

The ship Roger Stewart. The passenger Roger Stewart has sailed from Greenock for New York with 148 passengers, the number allowed vessel of her tonnage by the emigration laws of the United States. The passengers by this ship are of the "bein'" and respectable classes, and take a great deal of capital with them. We learn about 20 passengers were rejected for want of accommodation. Three or four other vessels are at the berth for New York, and at present the trade for emigration gives reason to conclude, that they will have their quota of passengers.

[Glasgow Chronicle.]

The British Queen steamer. This immense magnificent vessel is hourly expected to reach New York, from Glasgow, where she has departed with her engines, and previous to her departure her first voyage to New York, which has been verified for the 29th of this month. [Penny Magazine.]

American compliment to queen Victoria. The president, &c. of Columbia college, New York, agreed to place the gilded crown, which formerly adorned the cupola of the college previous to the revolution, upon the figure head of the Queen (steamer) expected at New York during summer. This superbly made crown has remained in their library since 1777.

The American minister and Mrs. Stevenson are passing a few days with Mrs. Marryatt, at a delightful villa, at Wibleton.

At Paris a considerable failure has occurred Messrs. Outrequin & Jauge, the bankers to Carlos.

A young woman in Turkey entered the military service in disguise, not long since, in order to follow a lover, who had been forced to go in the army. Such a circumstance, though it has not been witnessed in western Europe, had never before been known in the east, and it appeared after the female recruit had behaved with credit for a while, her sex was discovered by the time she was going to be made a sergeant, the awkward fact of her becoming a mother.

March of drunkenness. No less than 41,538 gallons of alcohol, which is double the strength which is called proof spirit, are consumed in this year. Forty-one million gallons of rank poison. Who can then wonder at the amount of poverty, crime, disease and death produced in this country.

American enterprise. The last papers from New York mention the arrival of a cargo of ice from America.

From the Morning Post, June 8.

We understand that a great number of American bills have been protested within the last two weeks. This arises, we suppose, principally from the stagnant state of the cotton market at Liverpool, and the difficulty in the present condition of the money market, of realizing American securities. The agency houses cannot be expected to stand the existing circumstances, to come under the influence for their American principals beyond a limited amount. Many of them have, we dare say, already gone further than they were at all warranted in doing.

A host of persons have come over from New York by the late arrivals, charged with other transatlantic investments for the purpose of raising money, but many of them are, from what we can learn, a description of property that capitalists would do well to avoid.

State of trade at Manchester, Friday. There has been a fair extent of business done this week in both goods and yarns. Great efforts have been made both by manufacturers and spinners to obtain better prices; but for goods we have not heard of a single instance where higher prices have been obtained. For some numbers of twist it is probable that a little advance on last week's rates has been realized; but in the general trade former quotations must be repeated. Large quantities of goods are packing for America, embracing nearly every description of fabric. There have been three or four failures in the town and neighborhood, but none of any great moment.

Huddersfield, Tuesday. The attendance of buyers to-day was considerable, and in some sorts of heavy goods a large business must be noted as having taken place. Some of our export merchants are packing on a large scale, but the destination of some of the goods is not generally known. Prices, however, are not higher. There is not that demand for fancy articles that was experienced two months ago, though for some particular fabrics the production does not exceed the demand. In wool no variation in value.

Leeds, Tuesday. Things are decidedly improving so far as demand goes. We perceive a considerable stir among some of our principal warehouses, whose business is chiefly confined to the U. States, and orders from America are understood to be considerable. The depressed state of many branches of the home trade makes this department of our manufacture by no means brisk, and till we have a healthy hand demand, things cannot be expected to be satisfactory either in demand or prices. Wool is as last reported, duller if any thing.

Widelyfield wool market The wool market is becoming very dull here, and to quit stock is an event even lower rates than were taken last week must be submitted to. The wool-growing districts, and the prices are likely to be fully depressed as late this intelligence has made some dealers to be very indifferent to making sales, whilst others are willing to meet the manufacturers on a fair terms. Short fine wools are tolerable fair sale.

Bradford, Thursday. We had a better attendance of buyers at market to-day, but, as far as our information extends, it did not lead to any improvement in prices. A considerable number of pieces changed hands, and the best informed seemed to anticipate rather healthy markets for some time to come. Yarns: There is a continued good demand for this article, and prices remarkably steady, with a tendency upwards. The stocks in hand are said to be exceedingly limited. Wool: Long wools are difficult to quit at former currency, but we think that generally prices are not lower: fine short qualities ready sale, but not dearer.

FRANCE.

Paris was quiet. There are rumors of dissensions in the cabinet, but they are not fully to be depended upon. But few seem to think that the present administration is the best possible, but here are few who do not admit that if an evil, it is a necessary one. The chamber at any rate is obviously of this opinion, and seems anxious to anathematize, by all its acts, the heavy vengeance that ought to be dealt out upon such as by their intrigues attempt to throw the country into the perplexities from which it has just emerged. This feeling must be very strong, since Odilon Barrot, the venerable leader of the opposition, is lending the cabinet all the support he is able.

M. Guizot is still absent from Paris, putting the finishing hand on an essay on Washington, which is shortly to appear. It is expected to return before the debates on the credit, which the ministry demanded on the first news of a rupture in the east. This is the only political question which is likely to be brought forward during the present session. The chamber is now occupied with the plan for a reduction of duties on colonial sugar. As there are many beet root manufacturers in the chamber, there is a strong opposition on this point. One of the late ministers, Lacave Lajaplagne, advocated, in his bureau, the suppression of all the manufacturers of beet root sugar, which he qualified as essentially injurious to the country.

Considerable activity prevails at Toulon; and the French squadron in the Mediterranean is to be increased to eleven sail of the line, six frigates and ten corvettes or brigs. The Paris journals are anxious to disclaim for the French government all responsibility for any grandizement in the east; but Guizot's speech, mentioned last week, speaks a language far different.

Cunin-Gradaive, the new minister of commerce, has introduced a bill to lessen the duties on colonial sugar, by which that commodity will be protected in the home markets to the extent of 33 frances in 100 kilogrammes. The Courier Francais says, that if this reduction of duty is made, there can be no competition with the colonies; and the result will be, not an increase of consumption, but less loss to the colonial planter and greater loss to the French producer.

Duperre, minister of marine, has announced that the French squadron on the Spanish coast is to be reinforced "in the interest of the queen of Spain's cause, to prevent the landing of supplies for Don Carlos, in an efficient manner." This announcement was held to be a sort of triumph for Thiers.

The election of M. D'Houdelot, the king's aide-camp, has been finally annulled; not so much for any real irregularity, as to marked dislike of Louis Philippe's favorite. Thus it appears that the king cannot depend upon the chamber of deputies, though he succeeded in obtaining a ministry of his own choice.

Passy is denounced as a radical by the Journal des Debats, for turning conservatives out of subordinate places in his office, to make room for some old liberal friends.

It is reported that Ripoll, a fortified town in Catalonia, has been captured, after an obstinate defence, by 8,000 Carlists, and all the inhabitants, with the garrison, massacred.

There is still no certain information respecting the Turkish and Egyptian armies in Syria. Letters from Vienna, received in Paris, allude to the reported collision between the two armies, but make light of the matter.

Proceeding on the belief that precautionary measures in the affairs of Turkey and Egypt were necessary, the French minister of the marine called for a grant of ten millions of francs; and animated debates on the affairs of the east took place in committees of the chamber of deputies. Guizot and Thiers were in different committees. The language of Guizot, who exerts a controlling influence on the French ministry, was unfriendly to England. He maintained that England had views upon Egypt which France could not sanction; and that in the approaching break-up, France must get what she could for herself—and he cared little whether it came from Russia or England. Thiers, on the other hand, declared that England had no ambitious views on Egypt; and he denied that Russia had excited collisions in the east: it was the interest of both Russia and England to preserve peace. He was opposed to the vote of ten millions for a mere naval promotion; and required a development of clear, rational views of policy, and definite alliances. To effect these necessary objects, a firm and talented cabinet was required; and he finally saw not a single individual in the existing government capable of considering the question.

The fiery large majority of 262 to 71 voted the secret-service-money demanded by the ministers. Have, June 8, 1859. There is a decided improvement in our cotton market both in prices and the extent of inquiry; our prices for ordinary and inferior descriptions have risen 5 a 7c. on the currency of the previous week, and the better qualities have recovered 2 a 3c. The total sales of the week reached 7,200 bales. The accounts from your side per steamer Liverpool, mentioning a falling off in shipments from our ports, have produced a feeling of confidence among holders, and the now well ascertained fact that consumers have exhausted their supplies, will induce them to hold out for enhanced prices—but still, it cannot be disputed that the accounts from the manufacturing towns bespeak no favorable change; manufactured goods continue quite unmercenary.

Have, June 10, 1859. Our cotton market has assumed a more cheering aspect, and both holders and buyers manifest a greater degree of confidence in the article. The inquiry to-day has been pretty animated, nearly 1,800 bales have been taken at a further improvement of 2 a 8; and a steady business is anticipated for the week, unless holders should hold out for higher prices.

In ashes we have the following sales; 68 bris. pots at 41f. and 48 pearls, first sort at 61f.

The following arrivals took place yesterday:—The Switzerland, Hunt, from Charleston, Lebia, Higgins, from Baltimore, (20 days); to-day, Coriolanus, Fenny, from New Orleans.

TURKEY AND EGYPT.

Accounts of the actual commencement of hostilities between the porte and the pasba of Egypt had been received. On the 5th of May, the European consuls at Alexandria were informed by Mehemet Ali, that the Turkish army under Hafiz pascha, twenty thousand strong, had crossed the Euphrates at Byr, and that instructions had been sent to Ibrahim pascha, to ascertain certainly that the Turks had first broken the peace, and in that case "to put his trust in God"—in other words, to attack them. It seems probable that Ibrahim, in obedience to these orders, attacked the Turks; for a "collision" is positively stated to have occurred on the frontiers of Syria. However, the Turkish ambassador at Paris assured the French government that he had received no information of the event, and was not disposed to credit the report. Byr, he added, was within the Turkish territory, and therefore occupation of that city would be no breach of the peace by Hafiz.

CHINA.

From China there are accounts direct to the 19th of February. On the 8th the chamber of commerce had issued a statement, giving the total exports of tea to that date, both to Great Britain, and the United States, which were as follows:—

	Pounds.
Black tea to Great Britain	21,637,333
Green do. do.	3,587,567
Total	25,224,900
Black tea in the United States	652,400
Green do. do.	3,761,733
Total	4,414,133

Silk to Great Britain, to the same date (peculs) 1,171
As the holidays were about to commence, there was not much business doing. Some purchases had, however, been made for exportation of first quality silk, at 540 to 555—say about 150 bales.

The papers contain the long proclamation from the governor ordering the back doors of the factories to be locked up with loose bricks.

(Extract.)

"Tang, governor of Canton, &c. proclaims to the security merchants, for their full information:—
"Whereas, on the 22d day of the 12th moon, (26th January.) I received the despatch from the hoppo, setting forth the following: It appears that in reference to the foreigners' factories, they are making back doors fronting the north, I already gave forth my edict commanding that, agreeably with the memorial presented to the emperor in the time of Ceen Ling, these should be stopped up to conform exactly with the old rule, and prevent leaking (out and in); and at the same time I wrote to your excellency that your excellency should issue orders for the same being put into force, as on record; however, it appears that the hong merchants have petitioned me to the following effect:—We the hong merchants, with deep respect to all the particulars of your excellency's edict, several times implored upon them, the said foreigners, that they should take the back doors fronting the north, and have them stopped up, when it appears they all said with one voice that they had not opened these back doors for the intention of smuggling, but as a precaution in case of fire."

From Singapore. We have by the Liverpool a Singapore Free Press, of February 14, in which there is a full record of the movements of the U. S. frigates Columbia and John Adams on the west coast of Sumatra.

There were no American vessels in port:—

From the Free Press.

We omitted last week to make any mention of the gaieties that had just taken place in commemoration of the twentieth anniversary of the settlement. The ball on the 5th, was of course attended by all the beauty of Singapore; while the presence of commodore Read, and several officers of the American frigate, made an important and agreeable addition to the chivalry present, Terpsichore asserting her dominion over all until a late hour. The public dinner on the following day, which was the anniversary, was a very first rate jollification, the toasting, speechifying and singing, being all most appropriate and in the best taste—and it was agreed by all that the exertions of Mr. Connelly in the chair contributed in no small degree to the hilarity of the evening.

While on this subject we may mention that colonel Cooke and the officers of the 8th, entertain commodore Read and the officers of the United States squadron at a ball and supper to-morrow evening.

SOUTH AMERICA.

We are indebted, says the New York American, of the 2d inst. to the kindness of Mr. Hobbs, secretary to commodore Ballard, for the annexed translations and extracts from Rio papers.

Extracts from the Rio circular.

Rio de Janeiro, May 10th, 1859. The political occurrences of the last month were of considerable and unusual interest, but, before we proceed to take a retrospect of the most important, we must present our readers with a translation of the speech delivered yesterday by the regent in person, on opening the session of the legislative assembly; it is as follows:

"His majesty the emperor, and his august sisters, continue to be blessed by the Most High with perfect health.

"The marriage of her imperial highness is one of the great objects which engages my attention, and I recommend to you in the name of the emperor, that you take the most essential consideration, in order that it may be carried into effect in a manner worthy of Brazil and the throne.

"Our friendly relations with other nations remain unaltered; we continue to receive the most satisfactory demonstrations of the interest which all nations take in the consolidation of the Brazilian monarchy, and in the glory and prosperity of the empire. The motives, which for a moment existed, for doubting a continuance of a good understanding between the imperial cabinet and that of the holy see, are removed.

"In the province of Rio Grande South, the conflict occasioned by the delusion of a part of its inhabitants unhappily continues; but the perseverance and moderation of the imperial government, aided by the example of constancy and firmness of those Brazilians who are faithful to their duty of allegiance will, (this I hope from the Omnipotent), re-establish the imperial sway, and cement concord between children of the same family.

"The other provinces of the empire manifest generally (I state it with pleasure) a spirit of order, accompanied by a devotedness to the principles of liberty rightly understood, which promises us a long continuance of tranquillity.

"The interpretation of the law of the 12th Aug. 1834, which reformed the constitution of the empire; the improvement of the circulating medium; a revision of the penal code; and a settled system of public instruction, such as may duly capacitate the youths of Brazil for the important offices of social life, whether civil or military: these, gentlemen, are the objects which will most especially continue to offer you useful matter for your labors.

"The session is opened.
(Signed.) PEDRO DE ARANJO LIMA."

"It is with the most painful feelings that we have to notice a melancholy occurrence which took place on the 21st ult. and which in its consequences might have seriously affected the personal safety of the British residents. The circumstances of the case, according to the best information we have been able to obtain, were as follows: The steamboat Esperaladora, (belonging to the Nietheroly company), on its return from an excursion up the bay, about 9 o'clock in the evening, unnecessarily and imprudently passed between his majesty's ship Stag and the brig Ganges, one of the captured slavers, and so closely to the latter as to excite suspicions, after what had happened on previous occasions, that an attempt was intended to bring away some of the slaves, or to afford the means of escape to the prisoners confined on board, and the more so as when alongside the engine was suddenly stopped. Commodore Sullivan, who was on the frigate's deck, on seeing this, gave orders on board the Ganges, to be prepared to fire, in case of any such attempt being made, but the sentinel, amidst the noise and confusion, hearing only the word fire, unhappily discharged his musket loaded with ball, and mortally wounded a Brazilian gentleman named Bulhoes, who was seated on the aft part of the steamer's deck, and who died on shore of the wound early on the following day."

"It will be easily believed that this sad accident caused a very great sensation, and that this was aggravated by persons who exerted themselves to fan the flame of popular excitement, by representing the act as a wanton aggression on the part of the British navy, as a gratuitous insult offered to the Brazilian nation, and as an act of barbarous revenge for the outrage committed the previous evening on a British boat's crew, whilst taking off the captain of one of the captured slavers, who had been landed for the purpose of being interrogated by the mixed commission, and as one that would be followed up by the execution as pirates of the persons in command of the slavers when captured.

"These efforts were but too successful in irritating the feelings of the populace against the British, and especially so against the emperor and the navy, which led to several acts of violence, and which might have proceeded to a frightful extent, had not the effervescent state of public feeling been in a great degree allayed by the publication of the following judicious letter addressed by the British minister to commodore Sullivan:

"It is with extreme pain that I have to address you on the occurrence of a most lamentable event, of which I have been officially informed by his excellency, the minister of foreign affairs, Senhor Candido Baptista de Oliveira.

"From the representations that have been made to me on the part of the imperial government, and from other sources. I learn that on the 21st inst. on its return from the island of Paqueta, the steamboat Esperaladora was fired into on passing the Ganges, one of the prize vessels lately captured with Africans on board, and that a respectable and industrious Brazilian gentleman was, by that shot, mortally wounded.

"I do not appear from the communication of his excellency, Senhor Candido Baptista de Oliveira, that there was the slightest provocation for this fatal act, nor is it represented as accidental; under such impressions, which, until I receive further explanation of the origin of this sad event, I am bound to entertain, terms are not strong enough to express the indignation and just reprobation with which such an outrage must be regarded: not alone must the feelings of an esteemed and friendly nation be roused in the highest degree by such a wanton act of barbarity, but I am certain, sir, that, as commodore and senior officer in command of his majesty's naval forces, at present in this harbor, you will fully share with me the feelings which cause me, not only as his majesty's charge d'affaires, but personally as an Englishman, deeply to deplore this event, and earnestly to desire to bring to justice the parties, whoever they may be, who, if I am rightly informed, have been guilty of an unprovoked crime.

"It is in the conviction, sir, that I shall meet on your part with every co-operation in bringing to light every the most minute circumstances and evidence calculated to obtain the ends of justice in this affair, that I now officially request that you will receive on board your frigate, whatever legal or competent authority, or whomsoever the imperial government may direct to examine into this lamentable affair; and afford every assistance in your power in furnishing evidence and investigating the true circumstances of the case—waiving on an occasion like this, any strict observance of legal or military forms or privileges.

"I make this request simultaneously with the application, which it is also my duty now to forward for every explanation, the result of the examination, which you will doubtless institute on this sad occasion, and which you will please furnish to myself—that may enable me to forward to the imperial government an early answer to the communication which I have had the honor to receive from his excellency Senhor Candido Baptista de Oliveira. I act thus, in order to avoid any possible delay in affording every assistance in your power, and being ready to receive on board your ship, the officers or others appointed by the imperial government, to examine into the truth of this melancholy affair—and bring the offender to such punishment as the award of justice may require.

"I am informed that at half past four this day, the judicial officer appointed for this purpose by the imperial government will proceed on board his majesty's ship Stag, in order to obtain the necessary information.

"Entirely relying on the proper feelings with which you will gladly second my efforts on this melancholy occasion, I have the honor to be, &c. &c.
(Signed.) WILLIAM G. OUSELEY.

Rio de Janeiro, April 23, 1839.

This letter was looked upon by the Brazilian public as the spontaneous effusion of a generous and sympathizing heart, written in the true spirit of British feeling no less prompt in redressing wrong than ready and determined to defend a right—equally yielding and conciliatory towards minor powers, as firm and undimching towards equals, or superiors, if, under heaven, any such there be.

Commodore Sullivan having signified, as was to be expected from him, his readiness to afford every facility in obtaining the necessary evidence of the facts of the case, in addition to the investigation, which he had himself previously and immediately instituted, the judge conservator for the British nation, the senator Senhor Catano Maria Lopez Gama, went on board H. M. ship Stag, to enter upon the examination of the circumstances of the case, but as no foreign authorities could proceed to a judicial inquiry on board a ship of war, which would be analogous to their admission into the courts of justice of the country, whose flag she bore, the inquiry took place on board the Ganges, and we understand that the evidence obtained from a variety of witnesses, (including the captain and major officers on board of the latter vessel), substantiated the facts as we have related them, in the commencement of the article; and that the sentinel, the marine Joseph Hain, having been found guilty of firing the fatal shot in question, the said judge demanded his being given up, but which demand the commodore stated he could not comply with, until he had communicated with the board of admiralty upon the subject; and that the said marine should be kept prisoner on board H. M. ship Stag, until the pleasure of the board be known. We understand further, that the judge requested commodore Sullivan to furnish him with a copy of the minutes of inquiry instituted by himself on board of H. M. ship Stag; and that the request was immediately complied with.

The minutes of the whole proceedings will of course be submitted to the consideration of the Brazilian government, and then probably become the subject of further communication with the British minister.

We should be guilty of an act of manifest injustice towards the Brazilian government, if we closed this article without recording the praiseworthy and energetic conduct of the competent authorities, in taking every precaution to prevent the acts of violence against the British, which it was justly apprehended the excited state of public feeling might occasion. The government was well informed, and knew that several individuals had made arrangements, and hired persons to molest the British, which information induced the minister of foreign affairs, Senhor Candido Baptista de Oliveira, to act the noble part of calling upon the Portuguese charge d'affaires, Senhor Joao Baptista Moreira; and intimating to him, that as the parties were all known to the police, it would be desirable that his excellency should use his influence to prevent unpleasant consequences. This intimation led to the following communication from the charge d'affaires of Portugal, of which, we understand the Brazilian minister had the first intimation by reading it in a public newspaper, namely:

"The undersigned, charge d'affaires of H. M. F. M. at the court of his majesty the emperor of Brazil, has the honor to address his excellency Senhor Candido Baptista de Oliveira, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, in order to afford an exact solution to the object for which his excellency called upon him at his residence. The undersigned, trusting his excellency that the supposition of the number of Portuguese subjects having been considerable among the assemblage of the populace in various parts of the city, with hostile demonstration towards British subjects belonging to the navy, must be exaggerated, stating at the same time that he gave it due attention, in order to take the necessary precautions, did no more than manifest his conviction of the love of good order, which is characteristic of the subjects of H. M. F. M. who resides in this metropolis; and, at the same time, that the undersigned took the necessary steps to prevent the Portuguese name from being involved in the late delinquent occurrence, he feels himself called upon to declare that such measures were unnecessary, as the Portuguese have continued from the commencement to conduct themselves in this matter of offending Brazilian national honor, with the utmost neutrality, thereby negating the incident, which occasioned a misunderstanding between the subjects of two friendly nations, and suppressing, as they ought to do, any expressions that might destroy the political indifference, which it is their duty to observe. The undersigned, in making this communication to his excellency, and of which the imperial government ought to be assured by the connection of the facts, must reiterate his assurance to his excellency that the Portuguese subjects, resident in Rio de Janeiro, will be, as they always have been, obedient to the laws of the country, and zealous observers of neutrality in questions which ought not to concern them.

"The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to reiterate his assurances to his excellency Senhor Candido Baptista de Oliveira of his particular respect and esteem."

(Signed.) JOAO BAPTISTA MOREIRA.
On Saturday, the 27th of April, his excellency the minister for foreign affairs, Senhor Candido Baptista, transmitted the following circular communication to the foreign ministers resident at his court:

"The undersigned, of the council of his majesty the emperor, minister and secretary of state for foreign affairs, has the honor to intimate to Sr. Rouen, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his majesty the king of the French, that the regent, in the name of the emperor, considering the continuance of diplomatic relations with Senhor Joao Baptista Moreira, charge d'affaires and consul general of H. M. F. M. incompatible with the dignity of the imperial government, has ordered the undersigned to cancel the exequatur of his patent as consul general in this empire.

"The undersigned reiterates his sentiments of esteem."

TO THE WHIGS OF VIRGINIA.
The central committee, appointed by the whig members of the last general assembly of Virginia, deem it a duty which that appointment has imposed upon them, to suggest and recommend to the numerous body of their fellow-citizens of this state who are opposed to the re-election of Mr. Van Buren to the presidency proper measures for producing concert of action among themselves at home, and concert also between them and their political friends in the other states of the Union.

As we now address ourselves only to those who concur in the opinion that Mr. Van Buren is wholly unworthy to fill the office of chief magistrate of this great people, it is therefore no part of our present purpose to enter into an examination of his official character and conduct, or those of his immediate predecessor, whose principles of government had policy he professes to follow, with a view to expose the dangerous faults and equally pernicious follies they have committed. The hollowness of all their professions—the dishonest arts they have practised or countenanced—their wild and mischievous experiments—their daring pretensions to powers never before claimed or heard of—their corrupt and corrupting abuse of the executive patronage—the baleful principles they have introduced into the administration, and the yet more baleful principles, absolutely incompatible with a government of laws, which they have promulgated, or sought to promulgate, by their unjust and fearful changes, which, by all these means, they have wrought in the character, the morals, and even the manners of the federal government, and, by consequence, in its probable destinies—these are topics which may be the theme of future discussions addressed to the good men of all parties.

Neither is it our purpose here to recommend the nomination of any particular citizen to be supported by the whig party as their candidate for the presidency. Our own strong and decided preference, indeed, points to the statesman whose benign influence this nation stands already indebted for the healing of the two most fearful dissensions that have ever distracted its councils; from whose practical wisdom, the result of great experience in public affairs, ability and virtue, we may expect a prudent prosperity, as well as just administration; whose large and liberal views, his high and noble, whose generous ambition will prompt him, whose patriotism will impel him, and whose firmness will enable him, to be the president of a nation, and not the president of a faction; and from whose moderation and magnanimity we may hope that the executive patronage, in his hands, will no longer be an instrument of favor, of revenge, or of ambition—no longer be degraded to the vile purposes of rewarding the selfish zeal of furious partisans and punishing the independence of honest opponents—of continuing power in the hands that hold it and perpetuating the domination of a party. But the great object we have at heart, far more than the nomination of the gentleman whom we prefer, is that concert and co-operation in effecting a nomination which will secure an undivided and strenuous support to the candidate, and that all our energies be united to forego our individual preferences, if it shall be required of us, in deference to the opinions and wishes of the party with whom we must act in order to make our strength effectual.

The propriety, or rather the indispensable necessity, of such concert, seems so obvious, that it is hoped hardly any thing but the suggestion can be wanting to produce a general, hearty, and prompt co-operation in any measures fair in themselves, and adapted to the accomplishment of the end, without embarrassing the cause with inquiries whether other measures might not be devised equally, and even perhaps more convenient than those proposed.

It is right, in this case, to learn prudence from our political adversaries. They have been indebted for the successes they have hitherto achieved, we are convinced, not so much to the strength and concert of design, combining of means, and concert of action, of all our energies to the execution of their plans. They resort to a regular party organization upon all occasions on which it can promise them any advantage. We have seen them holding a general convention in this city during the last spring, and organizing their whole party in Virginia, with the avowed purpose of affecting and controlling our then, approaching elections by force of party management—uniting, directing and stimulating their exertions. No attempt of the same kind was ever before made in the state. Strong as the temptation was to follow the example, and fair as would have been our excuse if we had followed it, we rejoice that it was not followed; for we think, contrary to the opinion of the exclusive democratic republicans, that it is a point of honor, and a respect for the intelligence or pride of the people to suppose them incapable of choosing their immediate representatives, without the aid of conventions and committees of vigilance to incite, instruct, and direct them. But the election of president and vice president, in its very nature, requires the agency of some assembly for the purpose of nomination and concert; and such assemblies have accordingly always been held, and, while the election shall be conducted in the manner it now is, always must be held for the purpose.

We are sensible that the partisans of the administration have peculiar facilities for party organization in the numerous regular army of office-holders enlisted in their service, and dispersed throughout the land, and in the party discipline they have established, which tolerate no individuality of character—no independence of thought or action; discipline founded in, and upheld by, a regular system of rewards and punishments, which the president, in the exercise of the executive patronage, administers without scruple, without shame and without moderation. Of these advantages they will doubtless avail themselves to the utmost; nor can we deprive them of them. But, as they themselves avow, they rest their hopes of success not so much on their own strength, or the judicious combination and direction of their strength, as upon the divisions and dissensions which they fondly believe to exist among us, their opponents, and which they labor by all means to inflame. This ground of hope it is in our power to take away from them, if we only true to ourselves and our cause. If the maintainers of presidential domination are right in the opinion they entertain; if nothing short of the executive patronage, actively and steadily employed, is of sufficient force to combine and hold together any party in this country in reference to the presidential election, then it is obvious that the president will always have the power of dictating his own re-appointment, and of appointing his successor, so long as the appointment to the office shall continue to be made in the form of an election.

We recommend, 1. That a convention of the whig party of Virginia be held at Staunton, on the 30th day of September next; to form which convention, the people of each county, town and election district of the state entitled to representation in the house of delegates, shall appoint two or more delegates as they may think proper to elect to that house. 2. That the people empower their delegates in the said convention, or such of them as shall attend, to determine, among other things, whether a separate state nomination of president and vice president should be made, or whether delegates should be appointed to the national convention proposed to be held at Harrisburg, in December next; if the convention determine on a separate state nomination, then to make or indicate the manner of making it; and if they determine to send delegates to the proposed convention at Harrisburg, then to appoint one delegate for each congressional district and two for the state at large, and to give them proper instructions. And, 3. We recommend to the whigs of the state, when they assemble to appoint delegates to the convention at Staunton, to appoint also a committee of vigilance in each county and town, and to communicate the names of the committees to the central committee.

THE PRESIDENT.

From the Harrisburg (Pa.) Reporter.

Mr. Van Buren left Washington on the 20th inst. and passed through Baltimore without the good people of that city being aware of his presence. The following day he reached York, and was waited upon by the population, old and young. On Saturday, about 4 o'clock, he reached Harrisburg, where he took lodgings at Mr. Nagle's Union Hotel. He was shortly waited on by a committee from the senate, and also from the public, headed by their speaker. He declined all public honors. The president, whilst here, was visited by the members of both houses of the legislature, by the governor, heads of departments, and by as many of the people as he could conveniently shake hands with, from Saturday until Monday. Every one appeared pleased with the urbanity of his demeanor, and the propriety of his conduct.

On Monday he left for Lebanon, and whilst there, was visited by persons of every party denomination. On Tuesday he reached Reading, the political centre of "Old Berks." The warmth of his reception, there, may be gathered from the following letter, written by a friend, who never voted a democratic ticket in his life, and therefore cannot be charged with political partiality:

"Reading, Wednesday morning, June 26.

"On my arrival last evening, I found the president elegantly quartered at Herr's hotel, still receiving visitors of distinction of all parties, cordially welcoming him to 'Old Berks.' In the night, the court house was brilliantly illuminated, and a large bonfire built at each extremity of Penn square. I was told that his arrival was announced by the ringing of all the bells in town. He was escorted to his lodgings by a large escort of horse and foot. He was entertained last night with unusual splendor at the mansion of Samuel Bell, jr. esq. where a large party of ladies (looking as Pennsylvania's daughters always do, peerless), and gentlemen had previously assembled to receive him. He appeared delighted throughout the evening. In short, my dear sir, Reading fully sustained her character for genuine hospitality.

"He departs hence at about 11 o'clock, for Easton."

The unostentatious manner in which Mr. Van Buren travels, has put to rest in this region, the "terrific" stories we used to hear about English servants, horses and carriages. They were ratiocated with such pertinacity, as to make some people really believe there was truth mixed with all this fiction—now we know 'it's all a fiction.'

We annex the following correspondence, between the democratic members of the senate and house, and the president, in which it will be seen he declines the hospitality tendered to him by the representatives of the people.

The democratic members of the senate and house of representatives, having learned that president Van Buren would pass through Harrisburg in a few days, assembled in the east committee room, June 21, 1839.

General William T. Rogers, of Bucks, was called to the chair, and R. Broadhead, jr. of Northampton, appointed secretary.

On motion of Mr. Senator Myers, it was Resolved, That a committee of thirteen be appointed to make suitable arrangements for the reception and entertainment of Martin Van Buren, president of the United States, if he should visit Harrisburg on his way to the north, and that the chairman and secretary be placed upon the committee.

William T. Rogers, Henry Myers, A. V. Parsons, Charles Brown, S. L. Carpenter, Wm. Hopkins, R. P. Flenkinn, W. P. Wilcox, Henry Longaker, T. B. McElwee, F. Smith, J. Woodburn and R. Broadhead, jr. were appointed the committee.

SIR: The undersigned have been appointed a committee by the democratic members of the senate and house of representatives, to express the gratification they feel, in welcoming you to the capital of Pennsylvania, and to request that you will afford them an opportunity to express the high sense they entertain for your public character and moral worth, by dining with them at such time and place as may be most agreeable to you, or in such time and manner as may best suit your wishes and convenience.

Harrisburg, June 24, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: Your letter, informing me that you have been appointed a committee by the democratic members of the senate and house of representatives, to express the gratification they feel in welcoming me to the capital of Pennsylvania, and inviting me to a public dinner at such time and place as may be most agreeable to myself, was placed in my hands on Saturday. Having explained to the members of the committee by whom it was presented, the reasons which put it out of my power to avail myself of that invitation so kindly given, it only remains for me to return to you, and to those whom you represent, my grateful acknowledgments, as well for the particular mark of their respect which you were deputed to offer me, as for the very gratifying and friendly manner in which they have been pleased to receive me. Such attention could not have proceeded from a source posassing in a higher degree my confidence and regard, than the democratic members of the legislature of this great and patriotic state.

Be pleased, gentlemen, to convey to those whom you represent, and to accept for yourself, assurances of the respect and esteem with which I am

Your friend and obedient servant.

M. VAN BUREN.

To the honorable Messrs. Rogers, Myers, Parsons, Carpenter, Brown, of the senate, and Hopkins, Smith, Longaker, Broadhead, Wilcox, McElwee, Woodburn, and Flenniken, of the house.

From the Easton Democrat, July 4.

On Wednesday evening, the committee of escort assembled at Heckman's hotel, and organized by choosing John Davis, esq. chief marshal, and on Thursday at about eleven o'clock, Mr. Van Buren arrived at Bethlehem, to which place he was escorted by our friends from Lehigh county, and where he was received with every demonstration of respect by the Bethlehem committee, and citizens of all parties.

Having dined at Bethlehem, he was delivered over to the Northampton committee at 2 o'clock, and proceeded to Easton in colonel Porter's carriage, accompanied by the committee of reception.—His son rode in the president's own carriage, accompanied by colonel Irlie. The escort on horseback, under command of marshal Davis, preceded the president and the residue of the citizens followed in upwards of fifty carriages. Having halted at Butzown, and at Dietrich's, for a few minutes, the procession proceeded to Easton, and arrived at about half past 4 o'clock, P. M. where the president was received with a national salute from mount Jefferson, (under directions of Mr. John J. Hester) the ringing of bells, and the continued cheers of our citizens, who lined the streets from the outlets to the hotel.

On arriving at the American hotel, (kept by Mr. A. D. Olmstead) the president's parlor was immediately so crowded that it was found necessary to remove to the lower floor in order to permit the introduction of the hundreds of citizens who awaited his arrival, and desired to grasp the hand of "the man whom they had delighted to honor." We presume that nearly one thousand persons were introduced to him in the course of the afternoon, and it was particularly pleasing to see how he detained, to converse with them, the few surviving veterans of the revolution whom we have still left lingering among us.

During the afternoon the faculty of Lafayette college, in a body, waited upon and were introduced to the president, as were also the students of the institution generally. In the evening, pursuant to invitation he attended the concert of vocal and instrumental music, at the German Reformed church, and was much pleased with the performance of the ladies and gentlemen, which was highly creditable to them.

In the course of the evening and the next morning he visited three or four private families, and precisely at ten o'clock on the 28th he left us, escorted over the Delaware bridge in the same manner in which he had arrived, and was delivered over to the hands of the Greenwich (New Jersey) committee at the eastern end of the bridge, and thence proceeded to Belvidere.

On taking leave Mr. Reeder on behalf of the Northampton committee bade him a neat and appropriate adieu, to which the president replied with promptness and ease, and major C. Sitgreaves then, on behalf of our New Jersey friends, welcomed him to the soil of that patriotic state, in a speech of some length and great beauty, to which the president responded with his wonted aptness and felicity of expression.

LETTER OF THE COMMITTEE.

His excellency, Martin Van Buren, president of the United States.

HONORED SIR: On behalf of the people of Northampton county, we welcome you to her borders. It is the first time since the establishment of our government, that we have had the pleasure of meeting upon our own soil the president of the United States. That pleasure is greatly enhanced upon the present occasion, in being able to greet in your person the candidate of our choice, whose conduct in the executive chair has justified every hope of his friends, and who, by an able, independent, firm and republican exercise of the executive functions, has commanded the respect of nations abroad, and maintained the confidence of the people of the union at home.

We tender to you a hearty welcome to "old Northampton," which for near half a century has stood forth firm and fearless in her undeviating support of democratic men and democratic measures; and on behalf of her citizens, we respectfully request that you will partake of a public dinner with them at such time as may best suit your convenience.

THE PRESIDENT'S REPLY.

Easton, June 23, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: For the cordial welcome expressed in your letter, and which has been so enthusiastically confirmed by those whom you represent, I return my grateful acknowledgements. That I have had the good fortune, under circumstances of peculiar difficulty and responsibility, to retain the confidence originally reposed in me by them and by yourselves, and to elicit by my presence a display of personal regard like that which has greeted my arrival, will be counted the most agreeable reflections of my future life.

The invitation to a public dinner with which you have honored me, you must permit me respectfully to decline. Although frequently complimented by my fellow citizens with similar invitations, I have never, in the course of my public life, availed myself of them in a single instance. If an exception were to be made to this course, I could not desire an occasion more appropriate than that of an invitation proceeding from the people of "old Northampton," who have, as you truly say, "for nearly half a century, stood forth, firm and fearless, in their undeviating support of democratic men and measures." But considerations affecting my official position being added to a long cherished preference for a less ceremonious interchange of salutations with my political friends, and having already in the course of my journey, declined similar invitations from other highly esteemed portions of them, I am confident that the democracy of Northampton will indulge me in the adoption of a similar course in respect to themselves.

I cannot, gentlemen, in justice to my own feelings refrain from embracing this opportunity to express the high satisfaction from which I have derived from my visit, for the first time to the interior of your great and prosperous commonwealth.—From the county of York, where I entered it, "for nearly half a century, stood forth, firm and fearless, in their undeviating support of democratic men and measures." But considerations affecting my official position being added to a long cherished preference for a less ceremonious interchange of salutations with my political friends, and having already in the course of my journey, declined similar invitations from other highly esteemed portions of them, I am confident that the democracy of Northampton will indulge me in the adoption of a similar course in respect to themselves.

Do me the favor, gentlemen, to convey to those whom you represent, and to accept for yourselves assurances of the sincere regard and respect with which, I am, your friend and obedient servant.

M. VAN BUREN.

Messrs. A. H. Reeder, W. Kenedy, W. Hackett, Th. McKeen, W. McCartney, D. D. Wagueur, D. W. Davis, J. M. Porter, and G. Hess, jr. committee.

THE PRESIDENT AT NEW YORK.

We publish below the address delivered on the occasion of the reception of Mr. Van Buren by the committee of his democratic fellow citizens.

Mr. J. W. Edmonds, chairman of the committee of citizens, spoke as follows:

We have been chosen Mr. President, by your democratic fellow citizens, to convey to you, on this, your first visit to this city as chief magistrate of the union, their united congratulation and welcome.

On an occasion like this, it is not within the scope of our duty, to discuss the topics which divide the political world, however interesting they may be; but as free citizens, acknowledging a deep interest in all that concerns the common weal, it is not less due to ourselves, than demanded by truth and justice, that we should remember the events which have marked our history during your administration.

It is seldom that the energies of a nation are tried by convulsions like those which we have recently witnessed. It is seldom that questions of such vital importance to constitutional freedom, involving so deeply the existence and nature of republican government, and opinions so deeply interwoven in the prejudices and passions of human nature, combine to embitter political contests. Surely then the friends of popular institutions—all who have advocated a strict adherence to the provisions of our constitution, and all who wish our government to preserve the free and equal spirit infused into it by our fathers, have reason to be grateful. The storm which darkens the horizon, purifies the atmosphere, and the reverses which have tried, have also proved the resources, the energies, and the patriotism of the people.

We are not at this day to learn that long and continued prosperity is dangerous to the simplicity of free institutions. Errors, invited by temporary convenience, abuses, more to be dreaded from their very insignificance, identify themselves with legislation, and assume a pernicious importance from the frequency of their recurrence, and accumulation, and arrested by the vigilance of an intelligent people, undermine surely and unseen the fabric of constitutional liberty.

Deeply sensible of these reflections, and aware that a period had arrived when the public welfare—the purity of legislation—and the whole system of trade upon which our commercial prosperity rested, would depend upon the integrity and firmness of our representatives, the democracy of this state awaited, with solicitude, your first communication to congress, and have anxiously and approvingly observed your subsequent course.

It was not to be expected that the great reform which you recommended could be immediate, or that measures affecting widely every amplified relation of life, would pass without opposition.

The step of improvement is over the attachment of our interests to a system, by which, however evil—all who attain power by legislation, however unjust—those who govern, and those who fear a large and influential class, unite against the reformer, and deny the utility of any plan which works temporary loss to themselves. Time, however, is ever disappointing the expectations which are founded on the instability of popular opinion; and recent events have conclusively shown, that there is abundant virtue in the people—that there is in them a barrier adequate of resisting the influence of wealth—a feeling adequate to contend with the passion of covetousness, and principles impassable to temptation—and that opinions drawn from annals of the ignorant, debased and servile communities, have no applicability to a nation where the mind as well as the body is free, and where man is born to an inheritance of thought and education.

You, sir, upon whom, in vindicating our laws and constitution, the weight of executive responsibility has devolved, the approbation of your countrymen, no less than your own reflections, will be a sufficient return for the sacrifice of personal feelings involved in the fearless discharge of your high duties.

To us, who have supported the measures of your administration, time has added conviction as to the justice of our cause and determination to our purpose of maintaining it. And we are convinced that with you as our chief magistrate, neither the spirit of party, nor the workings of ambition, can retard that equal legislation which knows no favorites and sanctions no preferences.

We congratulate you upon the peace and prosperity which overpread our common country. In the full enjoyment of civil and religious liberty—with energies developing themselves in endless progression—with resources defying the limit of imagination—with territory uniting the advantages of every soil and climate—our future destinies justify the most sanguine hopes, and offer a theme of grateful contemplation. The cultivation of peace with all the world, and the preservation of our national honor unimpeached, are necessary to the attainment of this high estate, and devolve upon the executive duties of an important character. Twice, since your election, has the discharge of these duties demanded the exercise of great firmness and wisdom.

The difficulty of maintaining the just neutral relations of a frontier so extended as our own, is appreciated by few. The wild passions and restless actions engendered by constant collision and protected by an unsettled country and a disaffected neighborhood—the local jealousies incident to disputed questions of territorial jurisdiction are only understood by those who are witnesses of their magnitude. There was a period when those difficulties appeared insurmountable, and when the peaceful relations of two great nations seemed an inevitable sacrifice to circumstances beyond the reach of human foresight and firmness. Happily, those clouds have been dispersed, and with the satisfaction which such an issue must afford to the true patriot, you can enjoy the added consciousness of having mainly contributed to its accomplishment, and of having earned for yourself a signal mark of the confidence of the representatives of the whole people. We are not regardless of the protection and encouragement which, during your administration, have been afforded to the interests of literature, science and education, and we rejoice that those who elevate our national character by their erudition, have been so frequently selected by you to protect and represent our public interests.

With these views of your claim to the confidence of the American people, we look forward to the period when the measures of your administration shall receive their unbiased and united approbation, and in the name of those who are now the supporters of your principles and policy, and with every assurance of individual regard, we render you our cordial welcome to your native state.

To which the president replied:

GENTLEMEN: I am deeply and gratefully affected by this cordial reception on the part of my democratic fellow citizens of the city and county of New York. Long, very long, the recipient of their favor, and thoroughly impressed with a conviction of their unvarying patriotism, I can never be insensible to their good opinion. It is, therefore, with the liveliest satisfaction that I learn from you that my official conduct as president of the United States, has met the approbation of those who for their behalf you have addressed me. I estimate that approval the more highly from a belief that they have not overrated either the difficulties of my position, or the importance of the subjects upon which it has been my duty to act.

Your observations upon an important question in regard to our domestic policy—that of an independent treasury—shows a very mature and just consideration of the subject in all its bearings; tested by the principle which has been opposed to it—that of giving a temporary use of the public money, and a consequent control over it, to private corporations irresponsible to the people—it may well be regarded as a question involving the nature, and to some extent, the existence of republican institutions, as well as a consideration of the main purposes for which our government was established; whether for the safety of the nation, or the grandeur of the few—whether or not to secure the greatest good to the greatest number, in our view the only legitimate object of the institution of government among men. It is, to my mind, certain that under a system like ours, and in communities like those which compose the population of these states, the solution of the question embracing these considerations cannot long remain in doubt. Private interest and individual efforts under mistaken impressions as to its tendency, may indeed obstruct and delay, but they cannot control its final adjustment. On the contrary, we cannot be deceived in believing that the period is rapidly approaching when those efforts will be discontinued—when personal considerations will, unavoidably, be merged in the general current of public sentiment, and when a common interest in this respect will be placed on its only true and solid foundation, by the adoption of the measure referred to with the approbation of the people.

The views which you have taken of particular points in our foreign relations, which recently presented a very unfavorable aspect, are conceived in the same just and enlightened spirit. The long contested question between Great Britain and ourselves, in relation to the northeastern boundary, there is reason to hope, is in a fair way for a speedy and amicable settlement, and the troubles on the Canadian border, have, I am persuaded, passed their most dangerous crisis.

To cultivate a spirit of liberal concession in our public relations, and at the same time, to maintain with every power of our arms, the unimpaired and properly regarded by not all trusts of the highest nature. Experience has shown that these can be best discharged by invariably demanding justice ourselves, and as invariably pursuing the same line of conduct towards others. A momentary forgetfulness of the latter and great duty by a small number of our citizens on the northern frontier, had well nigh broken the peaceful relations of two great nations, and exposed to irreparable injury the dearest interests of millions of people, impelled to the most antibiotic intercourse by the strong ties of reciprocal interests, a common origin and a common language. The injurious consequences of a war between them, not only to the particular interests of each, but to those also of mankind, could not be exaggerated. It may, indeed, be safely affirmed, that there are not two other nations in the world, a war between whom would sever so many ties, or who are capable of inflicting upon each other such complicated and diversified evils. Although these considerations have no weight, and would probably receive from neither more than a passing regret in respect to the prosecution of a war rendered indispensable by a due regard to the national character, they could not be contemplated without the deepest sorrow as the result of a contest brought upon the two countries without necessity.

That the steps which were taken to preserve the public faith, and to suppress disorder in that quarter produced, in the then state of public feeling on the frontier, dissatisfaction even in persons entitled to no disappointment me. Trusting, however, to the good sense and ultimate just feeling of my countrymen, I was persuaded that those unfavorable impressions would be of short duration, and if I had even thought otherwise, I could not, I humbly hope, have been deterred from the performance of an obvious duty by personal considerations. All well disposed persons now see the matter in its true light; all feel that the obligations which public law imposes on civilized nations, and of which republican governments should be most rigidly observant, were for a moment lost sight of, and that to an extent which, if persisted in, would have rendered war inevitable. It affords me pleasure to learn that the course taken was, in your opinion, the best that could, under the circumstances of the case, have been pursued, and that the country has been saved from the calamity, by its adoption. The danger of a hostile collision arising from this source having, as I hope, passed away, the aspirations of the moment in a great degree having been allayed, and an opportunity for cool reflection afforded, may, I am sure, count with confidence upon a vigilant support by our citizens, of those great principles of international justice, the maintenance of which is alike indispensable to the preservation of social order and the peace of the world. In doing so, it does not follow that we are either to surrender the right of opinion, to suppress a solicitude for the spread of free government, or to withhold our best wishes for the success of all who are in good faith laboring for their establishment.

Allow me, gentlemen, once more to thank you for the highly gratifying manner in which you have been pleased to welcome my return to my native state, after an absence of unusual duration, and to assure you that your kindness will be long remembered.

MACKENZIE'S TRIAL.

JUDGE THOMPSON'S CHARGE.

Gentlemen of the jury.—The course which has been taken in this case by the defendant, makes it necessary for the court to be more elaborate in its charge to the jury than if the cause had been tried in the ordinary mode. The defendant has resorted to what was his right, and defended his own cause. Notwithstanding that, the court would have had the right to have confined him to the same limits and rules which would have been applied had his case been managed by counsel. But they have observed that there was a good deal of feeling, and probably many sympathies felt for the defendant, and they therefore thought proper to give him great latitude in the defence of his case—that latitude which would not have been given to legal counsel. But although the court have indulged the defendant in the wide range of observation which he has taken, they feel bound to instruct you, gentlemen, what you should and what you should not, admit in evidence, or take into your consideration, in arriving at a verdict in this case.

The observations which the defendant made, should have been confined to the testimony. But he has taken the design of a detour, and accounts the revolt in a neighboring province, their grievances, complaints and sufferings, and has brought almost every thing which he could collect together, to show that that revolt, or whatever it may be called, was justifiable and proper. He has also called your attention to various other parts of the world—to Texas, South America, Greece, &c.—to show that what he has done, has been done by others, with impunity and approval. But admitting all this, that there is oppression in Canada, and that the people of that province are justifiable in any attempt which they may make to free themselves from such oppression—it has no bearing upon the question which you are to try. Nor does it make any difference with you, or, in this case, although this defendant may have placed himself in a like position with the patriots of other countries. In regard to his zeal merely for the freedom of the Canadas, while there, or even here, we have no right to complain, nor do our laws interfere. No—there may be feelings and sympathies felt by every one who chooses to exercise such sympathy for the oppressions, if you please to call them so, of the Canadians, or any other people, without the violation of any law. And there have been such sympathies felt. It was natural that, with our people, there should be such sympathies; for we enjoy and appreciate all the benefits of free government. It is therefore natural that we should sympathise with those who are deprived of these blessings, and are struggling to secure them. But, with the affairs of the Canadas, so far as interference is concerned, we have nothing to do. Those who govern those provinces, may govern them as they please, and those who live under that government may find fault with their people. It is a family quarrel with which we have nothing to do. Any interference on our part, would be improper, and lead to interdicted war. It was to prevent any such interference in the affairs of neighboring nations that the neutrality act was passed. We are bound, by treaty, to other nations; and it is a matter of justice as well as policy, that we should confine ourselves to our own national affairs. If there be any citizen among us who may wish to embark in any attempt to liberate other countries, we do not prevent him, nor does the law. Every man may shoulder his musket alone, expatriate himself, and go into the service of any body of men or of any nation he pleases. He may embark in the Quixotic enterprises of any part of the world he may choose. It is his right, if he pleases to exercise it. Under the 6th section of the neutrality act, nothing of this kind is prohibited. It only prohibits the assisting in fitting out, or the providing means for, or aiding in, carrying on an expedition from the U. States against a power with which we are at peace.

A decision has been alluded to by the defendant, made by this court in the city of New York. The question was put to the court, by a public meeting, whether it would be a violation of the neutrality act, to furnish supplies, money and munitions of war, to enable Texas to carry on a war against Mexico—a nation with which we were at peace. The answer was given, that the mere meeting together of individuals, or the raising of money, or the collection of arms, to send to Texas, was no violation of this law; because it contemplates the fitting out an expedition in this country, and sending such expedition to another country. The sending of munitions of war to a band of men gathered together in another country, is not, in the eye of the law, an expedition. Nor does the law prohibit our citizens from sympathizing with the oppressed, nor does it prevent the personally carrying to them money or supplies. Any person has a right to do so. To do so is no violation of the law. But it is a violation of the law to go farther, and to fit out expeditions from our own country; and a violation of treaties also. Unless, therefore, the violation of these laws and treaties is prevented by the vigilance of the officers of the government, and the punishment of those guilty of their violation, it will be impossible for the country to continue at peace with other nations.

You are not, therefore, gentlemen, to take into consideration the internal condition of other countries, in bringing in your verdict in this case—although I have no reason to doubt but that the oppressions detailed here by the defendant really existed or do exist, and that all the zeal which he has displayed has been the zeal of a patriot; and as far as I have a right to express my individual opinion, I might give to the cause which he advocates my sympathies; but you are to try this case by the law of congress, and if the evidence brings him within the law, you are to bring him in guilty. But if there is any reasonable ground of doubt in the minds of the jury, they are to acquit him.

By these observations, gentlemen, you will see which has been made here, and which is often made, to which I would call your attention, and that is the remark that you are the judges of the law as well as the fact. But the law gives you no such power. It is true, you may assume the responsibility if you please, and if it be exercised by you, there is no remedy. But in exercising it, it is to be apprehended that more would depend upon the passions than upon the judgment of the jury. It is therefore the duty of the court to give you their opinion of the law, and it is left for you to decide whether you will accede to their opinion, or assume the responsibility of the construction of the law upon yourselves.

With these remarks, gentlemen, we are prepared to examine the question which you are now to try.

The indictment which has been found against the defendant is based upon the 6th section of the law of 1815, and which is as follows:—

§ 6. That if any person shall, within the territory or jurisdiction of the United States, begin or set on foot, or prepare the means for, any military expedition or enterprise to be carried on from thence against the territory or dominions of any foreign prince or state, or of any colony, district or people, within the United States or [at] peace, every person so offending, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and shall be fined not exceeding three thousand dollars, and imprisoned not more than three years.

This law contemplates an expedition to be commenced or to be set on foot, within the United States, and to operate upon or against, some power with which we are at peace. That is the general object of this section. The district attorney has, therefore, laid the charge which he has brought against the defendant in different ways in the indictment; but in every count of the indictment, it is affirmed that Canada is the territory of the British crown—a nation with which we are at peace. It is essential, therefore, to prove this latter fact; because if there is a state of war between the two countries, the fitting out of an expedition is no violation of the act. To show that we are now at peace with Great Britain, the district attorney has produced the treaty of 1815, by which treaty peace was declared. In that treaty Canada is recognised as one of the British provinces, and the boundary line between that country and this, in the Niagara river, is stated as being between Grand and Navy islands. Therefore, as by this treaty, the general government have recognised Canada as belonging to the crown, this court must, for with the executive department of the general government rests the power of recognising nations.—Since that treaty there has been nothing done to impair it. We must therefore now deem it to be still in full force. There has been no act recognised which would justify the opinion that a severance has ensued between the Canadas and the crown, and no authority quoted. A few opinions of men have been read, and the defendant has started the idea that the mal-administration of the government by those who hold the power has released the people from all allegiance to the crown of England. But none of these opinions can the court recognise.—We must look at the acts of the general government.—It would present a strange state of things to the world, if it was, in all courts, left with the jury to decide whether this or that province belonged to this or that nation.

Reference has been made to the destruction of the Caroline, to show that a war is being carried on between Canada and this government. But we have no right to draw such an inference from that act.—That department of our government which is alone empowered to declare war, or to declare where war exists, has made no such proclamation. Until there is some act on the part of such department of the government, a jury has no right to declare where war exists, or to determine what shall constitute war.

Then, gentlemen, you are to assume that Canada is a province of Great Britain, and that Great Britain is a nation with which we are at peace. This must properly assumed you are to examine the testimony, and from it to judge whether the expedition which has been brought to light, is an expedition of the character recognised by the law.

The provision is, that if any person, within the territory of the United States, shall begin, or set on foot, or provide for, any expedition from this country, &c. Now, gentlemen, what is the fair construction to be given to this provision of law? It has been argued that the person who organizes the expedition, and who is considered the commander of the expedition, is the only responsible person.—But this is not correct. If so be that an individual participates in the getting up of an expedition, it matters not whether he is at the head of such an expedition or not. If it is connected in any way whatever with the expedition—whether as an officer, or private, or a mere co-operator—each and every one, each are equally culpable. If the defendant, therefore, has had any thing to do with the expedition in question—no matter whether he carried a sword or was in command or not—in the eye of the law he is guilty.

Then, gentlemen, what has he done? The first we hear is, that, on the 12th of December, a meeting was held at the theatre in the city of Buffalo, which this defendant attended and addressed. He has endeavored to excuse himself from any responsibility by saying that he was invited to address that meeting. But this is a matter of no consequence whatever. If the proceedings of that meeting, and what followed were illegal, and the defendant was consenting to, and participating in, such proceedings, no matter how he came there, he is guilty by the law. It is no excuse that he was invited there, or that many others were there. His guilt depends upon what he has done himself, and not what he has done by others, or upon what others have done for themselves. He may complain that others have not been prosecuted; but that is no excuse for him. If he did any thing in violation of this law, he is responsible for himself, and they for themselves.

But, gentlemen, there was nothing which he did in the meeting wrong. If he had stopped with what he said in the meeting, nothing would be found against him. The citizens of Buffalo had a right to meet, to say and to sympathize as much as they pleased. It is not for speaking that this defendant is arraigned here. It is for his acts and not for his speeches. His speeches can only be alluded to, here, to show the intent of what followed. In his speech, he alluded to the affairs of Canada, and the wants of those who were there in arms. Among these wants were enumerated munitions of war. In this there was nothing wrong. But after the meeting, we find him joining himself with Sutherland, who asked for volunteers, and begged men to join him, in the presence and near by the defendant. Sutherland volunteered himself to carry out the views of the defendant, and goes out. There is music at the door, and a party follows that music with Sutherland and me. It is therefore, gentlemen, for you to say whether defendant did or did not, that night, accompany Sutherland, although there appears nothing to show that defendant was with him until next day at Black Rock.

Was there, at Black Rock, a military expedition? When the witnesses Brace and Barton arrived there, what did they find? Was there a military expedition fitting out there? We are told that there was the array of a military force—that sentinels were stationed, who threatened violence to any person who attempted to interfere with their military arrangements.—There was no law which authorised this array or these threats. The array was a military one—a preparation for a military movement of some sort. Was the defendant there, countenancing this array? It has been shown that he was there, and that he made a speech to the people which was calculated to excite them to resist any attempt which might be made to take away the arms held by those in a military array. This, gentlemen, seems to identify the defendant with the expedition; and the sheriff tells us, that he was the only one who made any objection to his taking away the arms. This fact is only important to show that he was aiding in carrying out the expedition. Whether he was one of those who started the expedition, or a leader in the expedition, does not appear, nor is it material; for these acts to have been all, the regulation of officers, &c. which is usual in military arrays.

Then, gentlemen, it appears that Sutherland was there—Sutherland who had been at the theatre—Sutherland who had aided in raising these forces, and who appeared to be the chief officer carrying on the expedition. In what way was the defendant connected with him? The answer of this question depends, in part, upon the proclamation which has been brought into court. You are to decide whether that proclamation has been proven upon the defendant. From the testimony it appears that he went to a printing office in Buffalo, and ordered one thousand copies printed.—That the proof sheet was sent to him while he was in Buffalo—that some copies of the paper were circulated in this country, but not by defendant—that the residue were sent to Navy Island—and that defendant there gave copies to Smith and others. If you have any doubt whether the defendant is identified with this proclamation, he will, of course, have the benefit of that doubt. But for my own part I cannot see any ground to doubt. But this proclamation is only important, because it shows that the defendant recognises Sutherland and Van Rensselaer as co-operators with him in the expedition. Thus recognising these men, he becomes identified with them. If it is shown that there is a combination, each of those in the combination, must be responsible for the acts of all his co-operators. If it is proven that Sutherland was a co-operator with defendant, then defendant is responsible for the act of Sutherland. That defendant did co-operate with Sutherland is evident from the testimony.

There is no evidence to show, gentlemen, that Navy Island was occupied by an armed force previous to the military congregation at Black Rock. It is therefore proper to suppose that this military array was the force which first entered upon Navy Island, particularly as we have no evidence that it was disbanded, and as we find Sutherland, defendant and others who were at Black Rock, on the Island.

These, gentlemen, are all the points which it will be necessary for me to notice. In deciding upon your verdict, you will undoubtedly act in view of the obligation you have taken, and the evidence which has been adduced in the case.—You will not allow your feelings to warp your judgments, although those feelings may be strong in favor of the defendant, and the people of Canada who are not in the enjoyment of those blessings which you deem essential to the perfection of human government. You are not called to decide according to your sympathies, but according to the law. You must not say, by your verdict, that all men may come to this country when they please, and aid in fitting out expeditions against other countries with which we are at peace. This is prohibited by the law. As, although this 6th section of the law has not often been put in force, other sections of the law have, so that it cannot be denominated a dead letter. So far, therefore, as this plea is concerned, the defendant stands before you without excuse. If you are satisfied that the array at Black Rock, was a military expedition, got up to invade Canada, you are bound, by your oath, to pronounce the defendant guilty. But, on the other hand, if you can discover any reasonable doubt of the character of that expedition, or the defendant's identity with it, then you should acquit him. But that doubt must be a doubt resting upon the judgment, and not upon any collateral feeling of the jury. If, in your judgment, you have any reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, you must certainly acquit him.

There is one remark, gentlemen, which has been made over and over again, by the defendant, which I feel called upon to notice, that is, as to the consequences of a conviction. He has again and again remarked that, if convicted, he must be sent to the state prison for three years, and be obliged to pay a fine of three thousand dollars. This may have been said from ignorance, or it may have been said to excite your sympathies. But with this you have no concern. It is proper, however, for the court to remark, that if convicted he will not be sent to Auburn. The court has no authority to send him to the state's prison. His imprisonment must be in a county jail. The court is not authorised to send an individual to the state prison unless the law annexes hard labor to the imprisonment. I only mention this, because it has been so often reiterated that, if convicted by you, the defendant would necessarily be sent to the Auburn prison for three years. The extent of the imprisonment and the fine also, is with the court, and they will exercise their judgment if your verdict be against the defendant: You may now retire.

RAIL ROADS.

From the Leeburg (Va.) Genius of Liberty.

We with pleasure give place to-day to the brief history of rail roads which will be found in another column. It was drawn up by a very intelligent young gentleman of this county, who has devoted many hours of careful study to improving himself in the science of civil engineering—and has recently presented to Mr. Geo. Carter, the president of the Gouse Creek and Little River Navigation company, a very handsome drawing of a steam engine, designed for propelling boats on canals. In the construction of this machine the principle is the same as that in general use and may be made from 2 to 6 horse power. The machinery is very simple and all attached to the boiler and will require but little fuel. It is intended to work on the stern of the boat and can with ease be removed from one boat to another—the wheel being placed in the stern, causes but little motion in the water and thus saves the banks of the canal from injury. The drawing and explanations of this machine are very creditable to the genius and industry of Mr. B. and we doubt not but the talents he is cultivating with so much assiduity instead of wasting his leisure in idleness or dissipation, will in good time be appreciated and amply rewarded by a discerning public.

At the commencement of the 17th century, the mode of conveying coals from the mine was, by means of carts and very frequently by mules or horseback. This was of course attended with very great expense and inconvenience, as very little of so heavy a material could be carried at one time.—This inconvenience led to the construction of a train road, which consisted of parallel flat wooden rails, laid along the ground, which had been previously made tolerably level. Upon the roads were used large rough wooden boxes upon wooden rollers made to fit the rails. The advantage gained by this contrivance, was nearly treble, as one horse could draw near 42 cwt. No great improvement upon this was made until the middle of the 18th century when iron wheels were adopted, in place of wooden rollers—and wooden rails laid aside for those of cast iron—these rails were made with a flange to prevent the wheel from running off the rail. In 1759 the edge rail was introduced, the principle of which has been retained up to the present time—this consists of a narrow rail, elevated several inches above the surface of the ground, and firmly fixed to sleepers or blocks—this rail was without a flange, it being transferred to the wheels of the wagons. At this period the only power used or indeed thought of, was the horse, and whenever the declivity was sufficient—the horse was detached and the wagon allowed to descend by its own gravity, by this the assistance of the horse became only necessary upon the level portions of the line and in returning with the empty wagons to the summit of the plain; the railway was so contrived that the loaded wagons should have to descend, this made a break or check requisite—which acted by the pressure between the fore and hind wheels, and being attached to a lever it could be regulated by the attendant according to the speed at which he wished the wagon to descend. It was, however, found that owing to the influence of the atmospheric changes on the rails—the gravitating force and consequently the action of the break was very irregular—and accidents were continually occurring, and many of them attended with serious results. About this time we find the self-acting plane, in very general use upon railways. The action of this kind of motive power is gravity, and the object of its thus being brought into practical use, was to regulate the velocity of the descending train, by making it draw up the empty one; this was done by means of a rope passing over a pulley at the top of the plane, having its separate ends attached to the two trains. Thus we see that the necessary endeavor to remedy a serious disadvantage gave an unsought for economy of power. At length the discovery of the active properties of steam led to a mighty revolution in our estimate of power, and enterprising the genius of Watt threw aside many obstacles—and to him we are indebted for the mighty invention of the rotary motion which gave to the steam engine, its present superiority over every other kind of power.

The idea of employing steam as a moving power to wheel carriages seems to have been first entertained by Mr. Watt about the year 1759. The design was however relinquished until the year 1802, when a patent was obtained expressly for the application of locomotive steam engines upon railways. This patent was afterwards acted upon at Merthyr Tydvil in Wales.

A want of proper information on the subject of adhesion, appears to have been the chief obstacle to the introduction of these engines: as it was imagined they would be powerless upon a level or ascending plane.

When two smooth surfaces subjected to pressure are in contact, a certain force is requisite to cause them to slide upon each other; and this resistance to motion is called "adhesion" and different substances and indeed like substances under different circumstances, possess the property in different degrees; if, for example, we take wrought iron wheels on wrought iron rails, we find the surface of the rails presenting a greater or less adhesion, in proportion as they are more or less affected by the weather—the adhesion being the greatest, when they are most free from extraneous matter—but when the rails are wet or muddy the adhesion is then the least. The greater the pressure upon the surfaces, the greater is the force required to give them opposite motion or sliding force, it necessarily follows that the two properties must be equal, hence the adhesive force bears some proportion to the weight or pressure applied. It is certain that the point of adhesion in a locomotive engine is the periphery of the wheels—and the wheels form the point of action, or receive the action of the impulsive force. If then we suppose a locomotive engine of just sufficient power to impel itself at a given speed—the adhesive property by preventing the sliding motion, forces the wheels round upon their axis. But if the ascent of the plane is great, the impulsive force is also resisted by gravity; and if we endeavor to overcome that resistance by decreasing the speed; the wheels will slide round upon the rails while the body remains stationary. Experience has likewise proved, that a body upon two wheels possesses only half the amount of adhesion to one upon four wheels. Thus suppose an engine with four iron wheels, upon wrought iron rails, weigh 5 tons; the adhesion would be upon four wheels 5 cwt. and if upon two wheels only 2½ cwt.

 allowing one-eighth the weight of the machine to each wheel. } 2=2½ cwt.

Many contrivances were adopted to procure a progressive motion to the engine—one was—a rack reaching the whole distance of the rail, along which toothed wheels, worked by the engine, travelled and thus produced a progressive motion—many other plans were tried—but each had some great disadvantage, that prevented its general adoption—and it was not until 1815 that it was proved, that the adhesive power of wheels was at all times sufficient to produce a progressive motion to the engine—with a train of loaded carriages, not only upon a level—but also with a slight inclination.

The first public railway was opened between Stockton and Darlington in the year 1825, and in 1826 the railway between Liverpool and Manchester commenced; and in September 1830 it was publicly opened in the presence of thousands of spectators.

This railway is 30 miles long, and is as nearly as possible a level line, the greatest ascent, if we except the tunnels and one ascending, and one descending plane near Rainhill—being about one in nine hundred, and the roundest curve not exceeding a deviation of more than one in two hundred from a straight line.

This railway consists of a double line of parallel rails—four feet eight inches apart—one of these is used in going and the other in returning. The line has occasional slidings to allow a free passage in case of any obstruction arising from the stoppage of a preceding train. Branch railways communicate with some of the intermediate towns lying north and south of the road.

The rails are of rolled iron two inches broad and one inch thick and 23 feet long. These are firmly fitted together, and placed upon cast iron chairs 3 feet apart—the chairs are supported on stone blocks or sleepers 12 inches deep, and 20 inches square, into each of which two holes are drilled, and filled up with oak plugs; to these the chairs bearing the rail are spiked down. In some places where the foundation may be expected to subside, oak-sleepers are used instead of stone. Station houses are kept at intervals of about a mile along the road, for the accommodation of the railway police. These stations form also depots for passengers, and from or to any of the intervening places. The duties assigned to the police are to guard the road, &c. In case of any accident their signal to the engineer is by means of a blue flag, by day and a swinging light at night. When a passenger is waiting at the station, a red flag is hoisted. In travelling in the dark the last carriage of every train carries "astern" a revolving lamp, one side of which is red and the other is blue. As long as the train is in motion, the red light presents itself to whatever follows—but at the instant of stopping, the blue light is turned outward. The engineer of the next train instantly sees the change, and avoids the collision, by throwing off the steam.

The detail of the whole of the line would be too long for insertion, but if any person wishes to know further particulars, the writer of this will take great pleasure in giving him any information he may desire. B. H. B.

CHARLOTTESVILLE—MONTICELLO—MR. JEFFERSON—UNIVERSITY OF VA.

From the letters from a Valetudinarian.

Charlottesville contains about a thousand inhabitants, and is the shire town of Albemarle. It seems to be a great thoroughfare for travellers, who pass through it from the four points of the compass—there are three mentionable things which contribute to render a 480 days' visit agreeable, that might otherwise have been dull and intolerable, viz. a great number of conservatives—a visit to Monticello, and a call at the university. It seemed to us that two-thirds of the people living in a neighborhood which is distinguished for having long enjoyed the society of Jefferson, of Madison, and of Monroe, are of that political class denominated conservative Republicans.

MONTICELLO, (pronounced Monticello, and signifying "beautiful mountain.") is in sight of Charlottesville, about a mile distant in a straight line, but a mile and a half by the road, which descends into the little valley of the Ravenna and then ascends and winds among the hills, and along the skirts of the mountain woods. Monticello is elevated, perhaps 400 or 500 feet, above the little stream that meanders at its base. It seems to be a secondary eminence of what is called the southern mountain, to which it bears a relation similar to that which the lesser husband of the dromedary's back bears to the larger one. Soon after passing the outside enclosure, and approaching the summit of the hill through a growth of oaks, we reach by the roadside the humble resting place of THOMAS JEFFERSON. Consecrated, as it is, by the choice and arrangement of the "sage" himself, we are not disposed to question its taste. We may wonder, however, that while the remains of many men of less worth have been honored by sculptured marble and splendid mausoleums, all that was mortal of the author of the Declaration of American Independence lies entombed in a rude and uninviting enclosure of a few yards square, without even a sod to check the drifting of its barren dust, and distinguished only by a plain, unsculptured, mutilated granite obelisk. The few rods of rough wall by which it is surrounded is crumbling to the level of its parent earth; the gate that once guarded the entrance is swung from its hinges, the gnarled shrub oak is growing by the wall; the dead leaves are gathered in the sunken grave; the skeleton of the body of Mrs. Jefferson is mutilated and broken, and the whole scene is one of singular rudeness and desolation, unrelieved by any visible testimony that the memories of those who lay buried there, are held in more than the ordinary esteem, cherished by the careless millions of the living for the innumerable dead.

The area of this little cemetery is but a few square yards, and contains about 15 graves, a few of which are of the family of Mr. Jefferson, and the rest of some of their friends.

The granite obelisk over Mr. Jefferson's remains has been shamefully desecrated, the corners having been broken off for the sake of gratifying the vanity of exhibiting a relic from the "tomb of the prophet." The piece of white marble which has been let into the granite, and bearing the principal inscription, has fallen out, and is preserved at the house. The inscription, which was prepared by Mr. Jefferson before his death, is as follows:

"Here was buried
 THOMAS JEFFERSON,
 AUTHOR,
 Of the Declaration of AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE, OF
 The Statute of Virginia
 FOR RELIGIOUS FREEDOM, AND FATHER OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA."

The word "FATHER" seems to have been dwelt upon with peculiar pride and emphasis. Below is this:

"Born April 2d,
 Died July 4th, 1826."

Immediately by the side of the obelisk repose the remains of Mr. Jefferson's wife. A plain white marble slab, much broken, lies upon the grave, bearing the following inscription:

"To the memory of Martha Jefferson, daughter of John Wayles,
 Born Oct. 19, 1748, O. S.
 Internaried with Thomas Jefferson
 Jan. 1, 1772, torn from him by death
 Sept. 6, 1782, this monument of his love

Then follows a Greek inscription from Homer, signifying, we believe, substantially, that, it is said we go after death to "Hades" where we meet those we loved and remember their faces.

Near by, are also buried two daughters of Mr. Jefferson, viz. Mrs. Randolph, who was the wife of Thomas Manly Randolph, once governor of Virginia, and mother of Thomas J. Randolph; and, Mrs. Eppes, whose husband was formerly in congress from this state. A grand-daughter of Mr. Jefferson the daughter of Gov. Randolph, is also buried by the side of her grand-parents, her grave being distinguished by a marble table bearing the following inscription:

"Mrs. A. C. Bankhead
 Born Jan. 23, 1791,—Died Feb. 11, 1826.
 Mourned, fill on earth,
 Meek piety cease to dwell,
 With angel goodness,
 From thine heaven forgive,
 The sorrowing heart,
 That would still hold thee here."

In another part of the enclosure, a marble slab lies upon the grave of a lad who was drowned in 1812. It bears the following epitaph:

"This slab is placed over the body
 William Morrison
 by his weeping and afflicted parents, a monument of bereaved affection and blighted hope."

A few feet beyond,
 "Two whitened flint-stones mark the feet and head," of "Mrs. Mary Stewart." To the others who lie here "in cold obstruction," "low in the ground," there is no tribute paid; they "grovel in indistinct decay;" they are not even distinguished by

"A low green hillock, two small gray stones Rising o'er the plains, which hold their bones," but the winds and rains and the equally rude feet of strangers have scattered the little heaps of dust by which another earth, honoring them more than the living, once acknowledged the space they filled in her bosom.

"How grave!
"How powerful is thy silent eloquence,
Which never flatters! Thou instruct'st the proud
That their vain pomp is but an empty cloud, Slave to each wind. The fair, the flowers they have Fresh in their cheek, are strewn upon a grave.
Thou tel'st the rich, their idols is but a vain show,
The vainly pleased, that, syren-like, their mirth Betrays to mischief!"

"Tyrant o'er tyrants," and over empires "whose graves heave but like the passing waves!" I live, only, despoils thee of thy trophies—the foot passenger and the chariot-wheel trample thy monuments unheeded—religion, only, robs thee of thy victory, and tells thee that the dead is not thy prisoner.

Passing on from this scene, we reach, after a few rods further ascent, the summit of Monticello, whose open lawn spreads before us like a table. We pass along a well beaten road under the shade of a row of oamburries, by the tottering remains of Mr. Jefferson's workshop, by one of the terraces appropriated to servants, around to the northeastern front of the principal mansion. A line, passing through this building and its terraces, would describe three sides of a parallelogram, the main building occupying the centre of the longest line. The terraces are used for all the purposes usually answered by out-buildings, and each extremity is terminated by small brick edifices, one serving for offices.

The main building is a curiosity—a monument of ingenious extravagance. It is a heterogeneous pile of brick and mortar, without unity or uniformity, upon which architecture seems to have exerted, if not exhausted, the versatility of her genius. It has, to all intents and purposes, four fronts: two of which lead to the walks along the tops of the terraces; another, with a portico, to an open lawn, once a flower garden, and the other, which is the northeastern, and probably main front by first intention, introduces you to a shaded lawn and an interesting prospect. This northeastern front is endowed with the larger and more finished portico, the roof of which sports a weather-cock, whose indications are made known upon a dial on the ceiling of the portico, which may be observed by the inmates without encountering the air. Directly over the door is the huge dial of a clock which is fastened on the wall inside, presenting a face there also, and announcing its tally of the hours upon a gong which may be heard, it is said, two or three miles. This clock requires winding once a week. The door over which it rests, introduces you to a spacious ante-room, on the rear side of which is a gallery or balcony high over the doors, employed once as a depository of curiosities. To this gallery, and also to the clock, Mr. Jefferson was wont to ascend by an ingenious ladder, so contrived as to close itself, like the parallel rules of a mathematician, into a single straight piece, the making and occupying a small space, and convenient for moving. The ponderous weights of the clock could not of course descend perpendicularly on account of the door. Mr. Jefferson, therefore, extended the cords each side to the wall, where he had painted in large letters, the several days of the week, in such distances above and below each other as would be daily described by the descent of the weights. When the week had passed, the weights indicated "Saturday;" then the clock was again wound up, and the weights ran up to "Sunday," and renewed their weekly downward career. In one corner of this ante-room stands a well executed bust of Voltaire, just as it was placed there, we believe, by Mr. Jefferson. The present proprietor has also supplied several curiosities.

Doors on the right and left lead to the opposite wings of the building, and a gallery opposite the front, opens into a fine "saloon." Here we behold again the mechanical genius of Mr. Jefferson's mechanical ingenuity and singular taste. The doors are large glasses set in mahogany frames, attached by hinges to each side, and opening through their centres. Each hall opens and shuts with the other, by means of some concealed spring or attachment which unites their movements. The saloon, or principal room where Mr. Jefferson was accustomed to receive his guests, is an octagonal apartment with high ceiling and tessellated floor, which last is literally of black walnut squares set in frames of white oak, and certainly of rich appearance. Two glass doors lead out of this drawing room, one into the southwestern portico, and the other into a dining room in the northwestern wing. This dining room is lighted by an awkward window in the top of the house, and there are several contrivances in the wall to bring up the viands and wine from the kitchen and cellar. Adjoining is a small round tea-room, lighted by glass doors, and once decorated with a variety of small statuary. This room, as well as a hall adjoining, leads to the terrace looking towards Charlottesville, on the angle of which Mr. Jefferson was accustomed to sit at twilight, and the superintendent at other times, with his glass, to the building of the university some two or three miles distant. The opposite or northern wing has several apartments, one of which was occupied as a bed room, another as a library, and a sort of vestibule leading to the southeastern terrace was used as a mechanical laboratory. The house appears, from the outside, to be only of one story—it is really of three. There are three flights of stairs painfully narrow, steep and dark. Over the drawing room, is a corresponding apartment intended for billiards; this game having been prohibited by law, the room was devoted to fiddling and dancing, of which Mr. Jefferson seemed to be fond. The rooms adjoining are contracted and ill-shaped dormitories, in which the bedsteads were supported by hooks in the wall. These rooms of this unaccommodated description in consequence of having been accommodated to the various shapes and dips of the roof, like the crooked roads in Dutch villages, which, after the houses are built are accommodated to each proprietor. We will venture to say that, Mr. Jefferson had no distinct conception of any design, when he commenced building, but enlarged, added and modified as his ingenuity contrived, until this incomprehensible pile reached this acme of its destiny in which it stands at present, still indeed unfinished.

Mr. Jefferson, apart from his distinguished political character, which all the world knows and feels, and half of it adores, was a remarkable man. He was tall, of rather a lean and hungry look, with sharp features, freckled face and red hair. He was fond of music, and performed very well on the violin; fond of statuary, architecture, mechanics, mathematics, the languages; addicted to the study of political and natural philosophy, and, with all, a courteous gentleman, an affable, generous, and a benevolent and patriotic citizen.

We have heard it said, that he wore red "brevities." This is not surprising, if it be considered that his hair was red, his face was red, and the very soil on which he lived was also red!

Monticello is worth climbing, for the sake of the fine prospect it commands. On both sides you behold, beneath you, farm houses, fields of green corn and of yellow wheat, pretty groves, an undulating surface, and streaks of the red and grey soil, the fat and lean of madam earth. The view extends on south until the plains meet the horizon, and on the north until the lofty peaks and unequal swells of the Blue Ridge are lost in their "azure blue." Charlottesville and the university dot the scene on the 200 acres, is capt. Levy, of the United States navy, a gentleman of Jewish descent, and a man of competence. Mr. Jefferson leaving his estate involuntarily, it was sold to a gentleman from whom captain Levy purchased it, as is said, for $2,500! We have heard it mentioned that, Mr. Jefferson expended on Monticello $70,000. The buildings are considerably decayed, and there is very little indcement to keep such an establishment in complete repair. Capt. Levy is at sea; but we were politely received and hospitably entertained, although the small family had just been afflicted by the death of one of its members—capt. Levy's mother.

It is estimated that about 1,000 persons visit Monticello in the course of each year.

The university of Virginia is a mile or two west of Charlottesville, on the road to the springs. Its plan is unique. Its buildings are situated on three sides of a grassy parallelogram, and consists of a large and prominent rotunda at its northern extremity, and of ten dwellings for professors, connected by low colonades, with single rooms for students, extending along on the east and west. From each building, therefore, the front of every other may be seen, and almost every one is distinguished by columns of different architecture. There are nine professors, one of whom is periodically chosen chairman of the faculty. To each professor is assigned distinct departments, an inducement to their exertion is presented by their emoluments being somewhat dependent upon the number of students they attract. Each student is required to graduate in a certain number of branches before he can receive the degree of master of arts. The stimulus to study is very great—the requirements being almost perfect in each branch. The capacity of the young men are thus thoroughly tested, and there are many who seem to be organically incapable of reaching a degree. Of a class of 80 in one branch, only nine received a diploma. There are at present about 250 students. The rotunda contains a laboratory, lecture rooms, and a commodious library of 16,000 vols. The university receives an annuity from the state of $15,000, and other sources of income increase its annual revenue to upwards of $21,000. In most of our American colleges a chapter of the Bible is read, and prayers are offered before the congregated students, morning and evening—this is not practised in this university except on Sundays. Near the university are, an observatory and the former residence of Mr. Monroe.

Here we will close our tedious descriptions for the present. The next attempt will be the "Letters of a Convesalee," and before the writer's journey in the mountains is ended, he hopes to commence "the grateful notes of a well man." The next topics are, the Blue Ridge—the Alleghanias, and the Warm Springs.

THE FIRST MOTION IN CONGRESS TO DECLARE THIS COUNTRY INDEPENDENT.

From the Philadelphia National Gazette.

The anniversary of our national independence suggests the propriety of recurring to the manner in which the declaration was introduced into the congress of 1776. We have recently been looking over files of colonial newspapers, of one especially published in this city, from 1767 to the commencement of the revolution, and find in them constant notes of preparation for the great issue which was finally decided against the parent country. The members of the first congress, wise and daring as they were, were conscious of the general opinions and spirit, which would sustain them in a legislative avowal of the absolute freedom of the states. It may be remembered that the first assembling of the revolutionary congress took place in this city on the 5th of September, 1774. Subsequently, the progress of the war continued to ripen the public mind and feelings for a total separation from Great Britain. We do not, however, until the 7th day of June, 1776, that any special action was had for that purpose.—On that day Richard Henry Lee, a delegate from Virginia, made the following motion, which was seconded by John Adams:

"—To declare these United Colonies free and independent states, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is and ought to be totally dissolved; that measures should be immediately taken for procuring assistance of foreign powers, and a confederation be formed to bind the colonies more closely together."

On the following day the subject was debated, and on the 1st of July, a committee consisting of five delegates, Messrs. Jefferson, Adams, Franklin, R. Sherman and R. Lawrence, were selected by ballot to draw up a Declaration of Independence. Acceding to parliamentary usage, Mr. Lee would have been the chairman of this committee, but he was absent in Virginia on account of the illness of a member of his family. Mr. Jefferson, however, having the greatest number of votes was selected by the other members of the committee to act as chairman, and the draft prepared by him was first read in committee. Some verbal alterations were made by Dr. Franklin and Mr. Adams, and it was not thought necessary to read the drafts prepared by the others.

The declaration thus prepared and amended, was finally adopted in congress on the 4th, and was read to a meeting of the citizens of Philadelphia, assembled in the State House yard, from the steps of the building. It is generally supposed that the names which are signed to this charter of American liberties, were all signed on the 4th of July. This is an error, explained in a letter of Thomas McKean, one of the Pennsylvania delegation. The delegates affixed their signatures to the engrossed copy of the declaration, now preserved in the state department at Washington, at different times; some indeed, several months after it had passed in congress and was published to the world.

The house in which Mr. Jefferson wrote the declaration is still standing, at the southwest corner of Seventh and Market streets, and is now occupied as a store by the Messrs. Gratz. Mr. Jefferson had rooms in it as a lodger, when a member of the congress of '76. The original draft with the interlineations and erasures, is now deposited in the hall of the American Philosophical society in this city.

After this little history, with which we have ventured to refresh our readers' memories, we may be indulged in a brief comment. The celebration of the day on which our national independence was first declared, is important in its effects upon the popular character, and especially upon the patriotic sentiments of the young. The mere idea of national independence is of minor moment. The time has long past, when the most visionary of our enemies could imagine that any foreign government would ever again be ascendant in this country. We feel the foundations of our common rights to be so deep, and the superstructure of freedom and prosperity so broad and firm, that in the lapse of another age we may clearly foresee the United States, by every test of national power, in advance of every rival. But the sentiments which it is truly important to cherish, and most appropriately when celebrating the birthday of our country, are those of political equality and the inalienable rights of all men, proclaimed in the Declaration of Independence, and made the basis of our democratic institutions. The list of grievances made by our ancestors may be no farther scanned than as they involve the assertion of the great principles of all free governments. It is the popular sovereignty, the legitimate might of intelligence and virtue existing in each member of the republican family, which should ever be presented as a novel and dearly bought heritage; the greatest ever enjoyed by any people, and one which the spirit of posterity requires at our hands, in absolute purity and integrity.

No philosophic student of the history of Europe for the last sixty years, no observer of her present condition, can fail to perceive that the elements of change borne from our shores, are rapidly filling her whole political atmosphere.

On the good sense of those, who may influence the conduct of the mass, will depend the tranquil operation of the causes already set in motion. Few deny that ameliorations of its condition are necessary, and peaceable concessions gradually made, will on the one hand abate no just privilege of the few, while they will elevate a majority to the exercise of higher civil rights and the enjoyment of greater social comforts. It therefore becomes a duty as well to the world as to ourselves, to perpetuate the example now exhibited in the United States, of a people educated, moral, industrious and prosperous, under a republican constitution and laws framed and administered by themselves.

JOHN ADAMS—GEORGE III.

The account that Mr. Adams gave, in a letter to a friend, of his introduction to George III, at the court of St. James, as the first minister from the rebel colonies, is very interesting.

"At one o'clock on Wednesday, the 1st of June, 1755, the master of ceremonies called at my house, and went with me to the secretary of state's office, in Cleaveland row, where the marquis of Carmarthen received and introduced me to Mr. Frazier, his under secretary, who had been as his lordship said, uninterruptedly in that office through all the changes of administration for thirty years. After a short conversation, lord Carmarthen invited me to go with him in his coach to court. When we arrived in the antechamber, the master of ceremonies introduced him, and attended me while the secretary of state went to take the commands of the king.—

While I stood in this place, where it seems all ministers stand upon such occasions, always attended by the master of ceremonies, the court was very full of ministers of state, bishops and all other sorts of courtiers, as well as the next room, which is the king's bed chamber. You may well suppose I was the focus of all eyes. I was relieved, however, from the embarrassment of it by the Swedish and Dutch ministers, who came to me and entertained me with a very agreeable conversation during the whole time. Some other gentlemen whom I had seen before came to make their compliments to me, until the marquis of Carmarthen returned and desired me to go with him to his majesty. I went with his lordship through the levee room into the king's closet. The door was shut, and I was left with his majesty and the secretary of state alone.—

I made the three reverences: one at the door, another about half way, and another before the presence, according to the usages established at this and the northern courts of Europe, and then I addressed myself to his majesty in the following words:

"SIR: The United States have appointed me minister plenipotentiary to your majesty, and have directed me to deliver to your majesty this letter, which contains the evidence of it. It is in obedience to their express commands that I have the honor to assure your majesty of their unanimous disposition and desire to cultivate the most friendly and liberal intercourse between your majesty's subjects and their citizens, and of their best wishes for your majesty's health and happiness, and for that of your family.

"The appointment of a minister from the United States to your majesty's court will form an epoch in the history of England and America. I think myself more fortunate than all my fellow citizens, in having the distinguished honor to be the first to stand in your majesty's royal presence in a diplomatic character; and I shall esteem myself the happiest of men if I can be instrumental in recommending my country more and more to your majesty's royal benevolence, and of restoring an entire esteem, confidence and affection; or, in better words, 'the old good nature, and the good old humor,' between people who, though separated by an ocean and under different governments, have the same language, a similar religion, a kindred blood. I beg your majesty's permission to add, that although I have sometimes before been instructed by my country, it was never in my whole life in a matter so agreeable to myself."

"The king listened to every word I said with dignity, it is true, but with apparent emotion.—Whether it was my visible agitation, for I felt more than I could express, that touched him, I cannot say; but he was much affected, and answered me with more tenderness than I had spoken with, and said—

"SIR: The circumstance of this audience are so extraordinary, the language you have now held is so extremely proper, and the feelings you have discovered so justly adapted to the occasion, that I not only receive with pleasure the assurance of the friendly disposition of the United States, but I am glad the choice has fallen upon you to be their minister. I wish you, sir, to believe, that it may be understood in America, that I have done nothing in the late contest but what I thought myself indispensably bound to do, by the duty which I owed my people. I will be frank with you. I was the last to conform to the separation; but the separation having become inevitable, I have always said, as I now say, that I would be the first to meet the friendship of the United States as an independent power. The moment I see such sentiments and language as yours prevail, and a disposition to give this country the preference, that moment I shall say let the circumstances of language, religion and blood have their natural, full effect."

"I dare not say that these were the king's precise words; and it is even possible that I may have in some particulars, mistaken his meaning; for although his pronunciation is as distinct as I ever heard, he hesitated sometimes between members of the same period. He was, indeed, much affected, and I was not less so; and therefore I cannot be certain that I was so attentive, heard so clearly and understood so perfectly, as to be confident of all his words or sense. This I do say, that the foregoing is his majesty's meaning, as I then understood it, and his own words, as nearly as I can recollect them.

"The king then asked me whether I came last from France, and, upon my answering in the affirmative, he put on an air of familiarity, and smiling, or rather laughing, said, 'there is an opinion among some people that you are not the most attached of all your countrymen to the manners of France.' I was surprised at this, because I thought it an indelicacy, and a descent from his dignity. I was a little embarrassed; but, determined not to deny the truth on the one hand, nor lead him to infer from it any attachment to England on the other, I threw off as much gravity as I could, and assumed an air of gaiety and a tone of decision, as far as was decent, and said, 'that opinion, sir, is not mistaken; I must avow to your majesty I have no attachment but to my own country.' The king replied as quick as lightning, 'an honest man will have no other.'

"The king then said a word or two to the secretary of state, which, being between them, I did not hear, and then turned round and bowed to me, as is customary with all kings and princes when they give the signal to retire. I retreated, stepping backwards as is the etiquette; and making my last reverence at the door of the chamber, I went to my carriage."

ON BRADDOCK'S DEATH.

From the Baltimore Chronicle.

To the Editors of the Chronicle:

Seeing in your paper of yesterday morning an article copied from the National Intelligencer, relating to the manner in which general Braddock lost his life, and as it is at variance with the generally received opinion derived from official accounts of the battle in which he fell, I have thought of the publication of a letter from his aid-de-camp, captain Orme, in my possession, addressed to governor Sharpe, and bearing a semi-official character, might prove interesting to your readers, and suggest a doubt of his having fallen by assassination. The circumstance of having had five horses shot under him shows his situation perilous enough to lead to the supposition that the wound which killed him was from the fire of the enemy by which his little army was surrounded.

A. SUBSCRIBER.

Fort Cumberland, July 13, 1755.

MY DEAR SIR: I am so extremely ill in bed with the wound I have received in my thigh, that I am under the necessity of employing my friend, capt. Dobson, to write for me.

I conclude you have had some account of the action near the banks of the Monongahela, about seven miles from the French fort, as the reports spread are very imperfect, what you have heard must be so too. You should have had more early accounts of it, but every officer whose business it was to have informed you was either killed or wounded, and our distressful situation puts it out of our power to attend to it so much as we would otherwise have done.

The 9th instant we passed and repassed the Monongahela by advancing first a party of 300 men, which was immediately followed by another of 200. The general, with the column of artillery, baggage and the main body of the army, passed the river the last time about one o'clock. As soon as the whole had got on the fort side of the Monongahela, we heard a very heavy and quick fire in our front; we immediately advanced in order to sustain them; but the detachment of the 200 and 300 men gave way and fell back on us, which caused such confusion and struck so great a panic among our men, that afterwards no military expedient could be made use of that had any effect on them; the men were so extremely deaf to the exhortations of the general and the officers that they fired away in the most irregular manner all their ammunition, and then ran off, leaving to the enemy the artillery, ammunition, provisions and baggage; nor could they be persuaded to stop till they got as far as Guest's plantation, nor there only a part, many of them proceeding as far as colonel Dunbar's party, who lay six miles on this side. The officers were absolutely sacrificed by their unparalleled good behaviour, advancing sometimes in bodies and sometimes separately, hoping by such example to engage the soldiers to follow them, but to no purpose.

The general had five horses shot under him, and at last received a wound through his right arm into his lungs, of which he died the 13th instant. Poor Shirley was shot through the head, captain Morris wounded. Mr. Washington had two horses shot under him, and his clothes shot through in several places, behaving the whole time with the greatest courage and resolution. Sir Peter Hacket was killed on the spot, colonel Burton and sir John St. Clair wounded, and enclosed I have sent you a list of the killed and wounded according to as exact an account as we are able to get.

Upon our proceeding with the whole convoy to the Little Meadows, it was found impracticable to advance in that manner; the general therefore advanced with twelve hundred men, with the necessary artillery, ammunition and provision, leaving the main body of the convoy under the command of colonel Dunbar, with orders to join him as soon as possible. In this manner we proceeded with safety and expedition till the fatal day I have just related, and happy it was that this disposition was made; otherwise the whole must have either starved or fallen into the hands of the enemy, as numbers would have been of no service to us, and our provision was all lost.

As our number of horses was so much reduced, and those extremely weak, and many carriages being wanted for the wounded men, occasioned our destroying the ammunition and superfluous part of the provisions left in colonel Dunbar's convoy, to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy.

As the whole of the artillery is lost, and the troops are so extremely weakened by death, wounds and sickness, it is judged impossible to make any further attempts; therefore colonel Dunbar is returning to Fort Cumberland, with every thing he is able to bring with him.

I propose remaining here until my wound will suffer me to remove to Philadelphia; from thence I shall make all possible despatch to England.—Whatever commands you may have for me you will do me the favor to direct to me here.

I am, with the greatest sincerity, your most obedient and most humble servant,

ROBERT ORME.

By the particular disposition of the French and Indians, it is impossible to judge of the numbers they had that day in the field.

As the general's chariot is to be disposed of, I should be glad to know if you would have it again. It has been at this place since our departure from hence. If you propose taking it again, I will send it to you, and bring the general's coach back.—Captain Winn's compliments attend you, with Mr. Washington's.

P. S. Writing to you as a friend, I flatter myself you will excuse the hurry in which this is written. To the honorable governor Sharpe.

CHRONICLE.

Breadstuffs in the west. At Cincinnati, on the 18th, ult. flour had fallen to $5 03, and but little doing. Wheat had fallen 20 cents per bushel, and was then plenty and dull at 90 cents, with the expectation of a still further decline. Although large supplies of flour had been received from Illinois, prices ranged from 70 to 80 cents, with a demand equal to the receipts—the disillers buying it as fast as received and sending it back to Illinois in the shape of whiskey.

The Buffalo Commercial Advertiser announces, under its marine head, the arrival at that port of the ship Milwaukee, captain Dickson, from St. Josephs, with nine thousand bushels wheat and eight hundred barrels flour.

This (remarks the New York American) is but a foretaste of the riches of the bountiful and boundless west. That vast granary is just beginning to unfold itself. The fertile soil has just yielded itself to the harrow and the cradle. Hereafter Ohio has been required to furnish Michigan with breadstuffs. Now, Michigan is not only supplied from her own broad wheat fields, but is sending vast surpluses to New York.

Flour and wheat. The Albany Journal states that the quantity of flour and wheat brought to the markets and left at the wharves below during the first two weeks in June, is as follows:

	Barrels flour.	Bushels wheat.
Schenectady,	7,750	1,000
West Troy,	14,433	14,350
Albany,	50,342	1,639

Harvest. During the ensuing week, there will be a general commencement made of the harvest in the Frederick and Middletown valleys, and we are happy to say that up to the present time, nothing has occurred, so far as we have heard, to mar the fine prospect which has heretofore existed of a most luxuriant and full crop. The golden fields have thus far escaped the influence of the mildew and the rust, (which the frequent rains of late gave some occasion to fear), and also the storms and a few more days of propitious weather, it is hoped, will enable the husbandmen heartily to rejoice over their well-filled garner, and heaped storehouses, and to celebrate such another "harvest home" as has not taken place for many years. Let them gratefully return thanks to him who has declared that, while the year remains, the seed time and the harvest shall not cease. [Frederick (Md.) Herald.]

The Trenton encampment continues to be visited by the citizens of neighboring towns and states in great numbers. The United States Gazette states that on Saturday last the United States troops at the camp paraded together, and were reviewed by general Estess, who is now in command at the encampment.—This is the first time that all the different arms have been brought to get together in a light infantry, as a regular unit. The whole force consisted of about seven hundred men, and their appearance was quite martial and imposing. It is understood that major general Scott will assume the command about the middle of August.

Bad economy. The engineers on the central line of rail road, in Michigan, have all thrown up their employ—ing to the reduction of compensation. The Detroit Advertiser says, very justly, that "scientific engineers cannot be employed at $500 per annum, while an unscientific engineer, by a single mistake, may cost the state its thousands."

A loud signature. Most of our readers will recollect Paddy's reason for writing so large that a sheet of paper would contain but a few words, viz: That he was "writing a loud letter" to his grandmother who was deaf. We are reminded of it by the following passage in a late letter of the Boston Post's English correspondent. After stating that he had seen the death warrant of Charles I. he proceeds to describe it thus: "Scientific as it is much more, and has quite an antique appearance. The signatures of all the regicide judges are on it, with their seals attached. Cromwell's is the third on the list. It is about twelve inches in length and eighteen or twenty in width."

This, we think, may well be pronounced a loud signature; and it appears to have the somewhat rare property of being broader than it is long. [Argus Revived.]

Consul. The president has officially recognized Albert Schumacher as "consul of the free and Hanseatic town of Bremen, for the part of Baltimore."

The army worm is committing great havoc in some sections of Illinois.

A constitution and state government lost for the want of eleven votes. The Tallahassee Star of the 19th ult. states that the official returns from the Alabama territory are received, and that the new plan of a constitution for the state of Florida has been rejected by eleven votes.

Diminution of cattle in Vermont. By a report made to the legislature of Vermont, it appears that there was a great diminution of the number of cattle in that state, and a corresponding increase of sheep, between the years 1832 and 1837. The diminution of value of oxen in the five years between the two periods mentioned, was 13,000; of cows 13,000; and of two year old cattle 15,000. The increase of sheep, in the same time, was one million.

Silk in Tennessee. A gentleman in Nashville has raised from half an ounce of eggs which cost $15 twenty-seven pounds of fine cocoons, after selling one quarter of the worms for $150. The market is now well stocked with eggs.

Expensive exercise. The sum of £70,000 has been voted by parliament for the erection of stables, at Windsor palace. It was voted to reduce the sum to £50,000, but did not succeed. The reason assigned for asking this large grant of money, was, that it was required to provide a riding house at Windsor, frequent exercise on horseback being necessary for her majesty's health.

The town of Quincy, in Illinois, has only been established some half dozen years, and yet has a large and rapidly increasing population. It was principally settled by New England men, one of whom, Mr. Tinsley, has put up a splendid hotel, which cost $100,000.

Crops in Texas. The Houston Telegraph says: "All accounts from the country continue to give us most cheering nature in regard to the coming crops. The seasonable rains which we had last week makes every thing look encouraging. The corn looks better than at any previous year."

Wheat and flour. The Albany Argus says that the wheat and flour arrived at the Hudson river in this and the preceding year during the week ending the 30th June, is as follows:

	Wheat.	Dcls. flour.
1883,	21,217	39,506
1889,	10,105	29,330
Showing a falling off of 11,112 and 10,176 being together equal to a falling off of 12,402 barrels of flour.
The total arrivals at the Hudson river in this and the preceding year, up to the 1st July, is as follows, viz:
1388	295,613 bbls.

Showing a falling off of 3,173 bbls. in the arrival at the Hudson river, notwithstanding there was up to the 1st June, an increase of 98,577 barrels in the quantity of wheat and flour coming in at Buffalo from Ohio, Michigan and Illinois over the former.

Richmond flour inspection. The Whig of Tuesday says: "We learn from the inspector that the extraordinary number of 233,149 barrels and half barrels of all qualities were inspected during the year ending 30th of June last. This is the largest number inspected for many years, and we believe has only been once exceeded."

The Catholics of Illinois are erecting two churches, one at Juliet, Will county, the other at Prairie du Rocher, in Jackson county. The Catholic missionaries fortified their lives in exploring, for the sake of their religion, all that vast country beyond the Alleghanies, and on the lake shores and head waters of the Mississippi, long before the cupidity of gold hunting adventurers, had courage to penetrate among the hordes of savages from whom the Jesuit priests suffered death and torture. [New York Star.]

Benefits of speculation. The Long Island Star says of agricultural resources of Long Island: "That vast amount of unimproved land on Long Island might very well excite the surprise of any person who knows the very high price of all kinds of agricultural productions in our market. Brooklyn alone has 3,394 acres lying without improvement, and Kings county, which in no part exceeds 8 or 9 miles from N. York, has 24,394 acres of unimproved land. Speculation is put down as the principal cause of this fact."

Strawberries. One day, or rather night, of last week, seventy-eight one and two horse wagons, loaded with strawberry canes from the country round Hackensack, in the English meadow, near the foot of the hawken hill, to the Hoboken ferry. Some of the wagons had over 700 baskets, and came a distance of twenty-three miles. Three times a week during the strawberry season, they leave home in the evening and are at the ferry by sunrise. One man has raised this year, two hundred and fifty dollars' worth of strawberries from one acre of ground. [New York City of Commerce.]

The drought and the heat in the south. Middleburgville, Geo. June 18. "The heat during the last week has been exceedingly oppressive. The thermometer ranging between 93 and 95. The surrounding country too, as well as our city, is suffering under a drought of several weeks. In the city, garden vegetables are literally parched and dried up, and in the surrounding country, corn is almost in the same situation, and yet there are no prospects of rain. We understand that some ten or twelve miles north of this place, on Friday night last, there was a severe hail storm, which like the one that fell in the same direction a few weeks past, has done a great deal of damage. Without there is an early rain, the planters in this vicinity will lose their crop of corn, and the cotton will be materially injured."

Tullahoma, June 15. The weather in this section is excessively dry. In fact, throughout Middle Florida, so great a drought has not been experienced for several years. In many sections not half a crop will be made, and unless we have rain in a day or two, the corn will be entirely ruined. Many of our planters will not make their bread. The cotton and generally looks well, although, if the drought continues it must soon feel the effects of the dry weather and heat. On some plantations, we learn it is even difficult to obtain sufficient water for horses and cattle.

Adams county (Pa.) election. Mr. Steven's majority over McDivitt, according to the official returns, is 465. For Stevens, 1,961, for McDivitt, 1,096.

Dreadful hail storm. A letter from Mr. Thomas H. Daniel, in the Petersburg Intelligencer, gives an account of a most destructive hail storm which passed over the southwestern part of Prince George and a portion of Sussex county, on Friday evening the 21st ult. It seems the crops of corn and wheat within its range were entirely destroyed. Mr. D. says:

"This evening I saw in Mr. Gee's lane large quantities of hail, some which were more than an inch in diameter, and that too, after having laid unprotected by any shade for about 27 hours. In another place, where it was protected from the sun, a gentleman of undoubted veracity informed me it was lying then on the ground six inches deep. The cloud commenced rising in the northwest a little after three o'clock, lowering in its appearance and portions of damage. It soon fell over, and the wind blew, the rain poured, the hail rattled, as if the 'rage and war of elements' was at its height. An old gentleman of the highest respectability, who numbers 75, informed me that he had never before witnessed such violent weather."

A correspondent of the Alton, Ill. Telegraph, gives the following account of a hail storm. "In the afternoon of Saturday, the 25th ult. the village of New Greenfield and the vicinity were visited by a hail storm of the most appalling character. The reader will hardly believe that, such was the extraordinary size of the hail stones, which at that occasion, that six of them weighed no less than seven pounds three ounces—that many of them were at least double the size of goose eggs; and that one actually measured seventeen inches in circumference. Pigs, sheep and other animals were killed by the enormous missiles, and a woman, who happened to be out of door at the time, was seriously injured. According to the usual mode of recovery." The editor of the Telegraph has full belief in the account, and says he knows his informant to be a man of strict veracity.

Newfoundland. The editor of the New York Courier and Enquirer has received the special appointment of lieutenant governor of this island, to the legislature at its recent adjournment of its session. From the following paragraph which it contains, there can be no doubt the British government is determined to establish a steam communication with her North American colonies.

"I am commanded to bring under the consideration of the legislature the intention of her majesty's government to establish a steam communication between the mother country and Nova Scotia, for the conveyance of mails and to and from the British North American possessions, with a view to ascertain in what degree Newfoundland can contribute to, or be benefited by, such an arrangement. I am directed to request the correspondence on this subject shall be sent down."

Curious case. When Dr. Theller, the patriot, was taken prisoner near Malden, by the British, he had money and a watch about him to the value of $85. Of this, according to the tradition, he was completely and immediately robbed by the captors. Dr. Reynolds, of Malden, was one of the capturing party, and he happening to be in Detroit, was arrested at the suit of Theller, for the debt. The case has since been tried before a justice at Detroit, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of Dr. Theller, for $85 and costs. Reynolds, according to the order of the court, was sent to the penitentiary. It did not appear in evidence that there was law, even in Great Britain, which refused to respect the private property of an invading foe, nor any testimony that the defendant had any commanding officer to be recognised in our courts. [Pennsylvania.]

New invention. We learn from a foreign paper that a surgeon of Guatresay, Mr. Le Mesurier, has recently invented a new pump for ships and mines, on a principle infinitely superior for all practical purposes, to any yet discovered. In this pump, the piston is dispensed with, and a vast jet is produced by means of a India rubber bulb stretched in rings. Some of its peculiarities are the total absence of friction, the impossibility of getting choked by sand, wheat, or even small stones, and a capability in a small sized one, worked by one man, of deluging a hog-head of water in a minute and a half. Mr. Le Mesurier has been offered 12,000 pounds for the patent.

It is stated in the Pittsburg Gazette, that captain Pepin—who, in conjunction with lieutenant Shoroborn, both of the Russian naval engineer service, is visiting the cities of Ohio and Mississippi, in order to make themselves acquainted with the navigation of these waters—has reached that city in the prosecution of the duty confided to him. Among other matters which engaged his attention at Pittsburg was the United States snag boat, for the removal of snags from the rivers, of which he has made a drawing, with an explanation of similar boats may be found elsewhere on the Don and Wolga, and other Russian rivers.

MILITARY CONVENTION. Monday, July 8th, 1839. Pursuant to public notice the delegates appointed to meet in convention for the purpose of maturing plans for erecting a monument on the battle ground at North Point, met at the City Hall, the following companies represented:

1st Balt. light infantry, Mechanical volunteers,
Independent blues, Baltimore city guards,
Junior artists, Independent grays,
Maryland cadets, Eutaw infantry,
German guards, Independent German
Junior guards, Yeager guards.

General Medart was called to the chair and Wm. Hope, appointed secretary.

On motion, a committee of one from each company was appointed to nominate permanent officers of the convention, who reported the following which was unanimously adopted:

Brig. Gen. MEDART, president.
Gen. C. O'DONNELL, 1st vice president.
Col. HICKMAN, 2d do. do.

Wm. Hope, of the cadets, } secretaries.
IV. H. Shipley, of the Indep't blues, }

On motion, a committee to consist of the president, the two vice presidents, and one delegate from each company was appointed for the purpose of reporting to the next meeting, such plans as they may deem expedient to carry into effect the object of this convention. It was

Resolved, That all companies not represented, be especially requested to appoint delegates to meet this convention.

The convention then adjourned to meet at the City Hall, on Tuesday evening, the 10th inst. at 8 o'clock.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, July 11, 1839. The board of the examination of midshipmen, convened at the naval asylum, Philadelphia, on the 24th ultimo, has closed its proceedings, a report of which was received at the department, and approved on the 8th inst.

FLORIDA. The following from our attentive correspondent we received yesterday, by the steamer Charleston, capt. Love:

Garey's Ferry, July 3, 1839.

My dear sir: The object for which Gen. Macomb's treaty was made, seems about to be accomplished. The Indians have been in large numbers to Fort Mellon and Fort King, and all report their entire willingness and determination to go within the designated boundaries, and there remain. Every means will be tried to secure them the peaceful possession of the alluded territory; and if nothing uncommon takes place, the wise ones say that the great, the everlasting Florida war is at length closed. The people of the United States, though, seem to place but little confidence in the report. They've heard that the "Florida war is at length concluded!" so often, that they have become quite incredulous; still I say all that can with perfect safety be said, "Nous verrons." Doctor Clark and col. Davenport were, by the last advices, very ill at Fort Fanning; they had drank from a well into which white lead had been thrown. Surgeon Tippler has been ordered from this post on temporary duty to Fort Fanning. I've just heard that col. Davenport is recovering, and is now on his way to this post, the head quarters of his district.

[Savannah Georgian.]

A letter from Dr. Byrne, of the army, dated Fort King, June 13, 1839, says: "Lieut. Ransom and myself, on our way here from Pilatka, met four Indians in a hammock about 10 miles from the latter place, and were much gratified and somewhat relieved on finding that they behaved like gentlemen. On our way from Payne's Landing this morning we met two others, and they also departed themselves properly, shaking hands with us, &c. There have been altogether between three and four hundred of them at this post, and there are at present about 160 encamped in this vicinity.—No body here doubts that they will comply with our gen. Macomb's arrangement. Tigertail has not yet appeared, but the Indians inform us that he will shortly come in."

TEXAS. A proclamation of president Lamar advises all civil and military authorities of Texas not to exercise jurisdiction within the territory claimed by the United States until the boundary line between the two republics is definitively drawn.

We are gratified to announce the arrival in our city of Mr. William Kennedy, a gentleman of distinction and high reputation, both as a literary and political writer. He was attached to the suite of Lord Durham, and is now on a tour of pleasure and observation to our republic. Mr. Kennedy is the first Englishman of any celebrity that has been among us, and many advantages may be expected from the reports he may make of our progress and condition as a nation.

A reconnoiter took place on the 25th ult. at Quintana, between Wm. H. Butler and E. S. Kirby, in which the latter was killed with a bowie knife.—Butler surrendered himself to the civil authorities.

Near Lynchburg, on Monday last, four persons were drowned in the bayou. Their names we have been unable to learn, but we understand that they were attempting to proceed down the bayou in an overcharged progue, which soon filled and hastened the whole four to an untimely grave. The steamboat Correo picked up one of the bodies, which was interred in this city.

A severe battle was fought on the 26th ult. between the company of militia, consisting of about 35 men, under the command of capt. Bird, and a large body of Indians. The engagement took place on Little River, about 13 miles above Fort Smith.

On the afternoon of that day, several Indians were discovered by the scouts, and were immediately pursued by the whole company. The Indians at length disappeared in a thicket, and the company on approaching it, found that it was literally filled with Indians, who opened upon them a destructive fire. Nothing daunted, however, they fearlessly charged upon the enemy, and in a few moments completely routed them, and gained possession of the ground which they had occupied. The Indians soon after rallied again, and made repeated attacks upon them, but in vain. They were repeatedly repulsed with great loss. This heroic band sustained their position for more than two hours against four times their own number of the enemy. Towards sunset the Indian chief, apparently enraged to be thus held at bay by a force so greatly inferior to his own, conducted all his warriors and made one desperate charge, but fell when he had arrived within about 20 steps at the head of his men, and the remainder of the enemy seeing him fall, raised a hideous yell and fled, leaving him and about forty of their companions dead upon the field.

This victory will undoubtedly be of immense benefit to the citizens of the frontier settlements in that section, as these hordes of savages have infested that region for many months, and have hitherto held complete possession of the country. They will now be compelled to retire further northward, and leave those settlers in the undisturbed possession of their improvements. [Houston paper.]

FROM MEXICO. An arrival at New Orleans brings dates four days later from Metamoros. The New Orleans papers publish a letter received at the Merchants' Exchange, of which the following is an extract: "Things are not yet settled in Mexico."

Another fight at Sattilo—the federalists attacked that place with about 500 men under the command of gen. Lemas, and after an obstinate engagement of five hours, succeed in carrying the town. The commander of the government troops were shot dead, and the report goes, that there was an American with general Lemas, who used a rifle, and has the credit of sending a Texas visiting card, which took him under the eye.

It is also reported that general Canaliza has been defeated in an attempt to retake Monterey. If the report should prove true of his defeat, Metamoros will fall, and Bustamante will have to leave Tampico. It is their intention to march into Texas next September, with 5,000 men; and 2,000 Indians are to join them. We have an old fellow here who has returned from being the president a visit, (from Nacogoches), and is now on his return to keep note of the times. Gen. Santa Ana will do every thing in his power to have Bustamante put out of the way, consequently he will push him off to Texas; as he well knows that there is but one chance in a hundred of his ever returning.

LATE FROM GIBRALTAR. By the fast sailing bark Empress, capt. Townsend, from Palermo, the Journal of Commerce has a Gibraltar paper of June 6th. We annex a few extracts. The dates from Madrid by the steam ship Liverpool were to the 3d.

Gibraltar, June 6. Gen. Espartero has at length published a detailed account of his late operations against Ramales and Guardamino, to which is annexed a return of the prisoners taken from the enemy—318, including 25 superior and other officers. Of their killed or wounded the general does not speak; but states his own loss at 99 of the former, and 687 of the latter, besides 54 missing. Maroto swells it, in his official report, to upwards of 6,000 hors de combat.

Although the Madrid papers, received on Monday, mentioned a rising in favor of Don Carlos at Alcazar, but a few leagues to the south east of Guadajajara, we took no notice of it; seeing that the number of the disaffected was represented as insignificant, and it was affirmed that they had been crushed. To-day we find it stated, that the example of Alcocer has been followed in two neighboring places—Buendia and Viller del Ladrón; nor is it added, as in the first instance, that the contents have been put down. Far from it; a body of 3,000 men are said to have marched through the territory of Cuena on the 27th, who, it was suspected, were hastening to support their newly declared friends.—Notwithstanding Cabrera's retreat, the whole of that part of the country continued infested by bands at the last mentioned date; and the natives loudly complained of their being left wholly unprotected by both the Central government and the local authority.

Similar complaints were uttered from Requena at precisely the same time. That district was likewise overrun and laid waste by some rebel detachments on the one hand, while others were fortifying several points from which they would before long, completely command all the country round Moya, and the Cuena mountains, and thence might safely invade Upper Mancha at will, even with the most inconsiderable bodies of men. And, while all this was occurring, a division of the queen's troops (Aznar's) had come up; ascertained, that the enemy were within one day's march; drawn a quantity of rations from the magazine in the place; and instead of marching upon the rebels, had marched back in the direction of Liria, alleging that they had no orders.

According to a report current in Madrid, general Espartero, having been informed that Louis Philippe's commissioner at the head-quarters was corresponding with the Carlists, has ordered him to withdraw.

FROM LIBERIA, AFRICA. We received through the post office last evening, a file of the Liberia Herald, for March, April and May; they are, however, but little later than previous files in our possession, but contain some interesting items that we have not yet seen published in this country. We shall refer to them hereafter.

Some account is given of a recent attack on Bassa, by the natives, and the defence by what is termed the Americans. Some of the farms were plundered. The farms attached to the settlement of Edina are secured. This settlement has not been the scene of actual contest. Notwithstanding this drawback upon the agricultural operations of the year, the quantity of land at present under cultivation, far exceeds that of any former period—300 acres are said to be cleared and planted. In consequence of the destruction of farms, and the partial suspension of trade, a scarcity of provisions had prevailed, but by no means to an alarming or pressing degree.

From the Monrovia Herald.

We have heard with deep regret that Jenkins has again raised the whoop of war.

Prince, of Trade town, and Grand, of New Seas, are preparing for war. Each is threatening the other with an invasion of his territory.

We have just heard, by an arrival from Little Bassa, that the natives have made one attack on the Sinoe settlement. Three Americans are reported killed, and seven wounded.

Captain Murray, of the English brig —, is landing goods at Little Bassa, and advancing the price of every article of trade one hundred per cent. Captain Murray should be officially informed of his trespass on the territory of this colony, and warned to desist. The territory of Little Bassa is fairly and honorably the property of this colony, and he has no right to the commerce, unless under the regulations established by our commercial laws.

News has just arrived, that his excellency, governor Buchanan, is just recovering from an alarming illness. This accounts for the detention of the Saluda, captain Waters, who left this fifteen days ago to bring his excellency up to this place.

Died, in this town, on the 14th instant, after a severe illness of seven days, Joshua Stewart, esq. aged 69 years. Mr. Stewart was a native of Petersburg, Va. emigrated to this country in the ship Cyrus in 1824, and arrived here on the 12th of February. Mr. Stewart has successfully filled many important offices in the colony, having been at a former period a member of the legislature, and for many years one of the justices of the colony.

We were informed when at Cape Palmas, that while the Emperor, captain Lawlin, was lying at St. Andrews bay, a plot was concocted among some of the seamen to seize the ship and run off with her. This act of base treachery was detected on the day previously designated for its perpetration. The captain, immediately the fact was communicated to him, proceeded a short distance down the coast, where a number of friendly natives very opportunely coming on board, he was enabled to secure the villains. They are in prison at Cape Coast, to be sent to America for trial.

FROM THE FRONTIER. We regret that another disgraceful scene has been enacted on the frontier, by a party of refugees from Canada. The affair was most probably magnified by the Montreal papers into "another Yankee invasion," we give the following extract of a letter we have received from Holland, Vt. the town on this side adjoining Barnston, L. C. the place upon which the attack was made.

"The party, which consisted from ten to twenty men, all armed, arrived within half a mile of the line without being discovered, on Sunday night 22d inst. Here they remained concealed in the woods till Monday night, when after dark they emerged, and came to an opening on the premises of Mr. Mosier, about fifty rods this side the lines, and were discovered by his wife near his barn. One of the party followed the woman to the house, and met the husband, shook hands, and stated their object to be, to take the fire arms in the possession of Mr. Burroughs, captain of militia of Barnston. Mosier remonstrated against their proceeding further, and told him, that if his party committed any excesses in Canada, he himself would most probably be the victim of retaliation; that he should be ruined, his property destroyed, and buildings burnt.

"This had no effect on the gang which then proceeded to Burroughs, about three miles from Mosier's, and commenced their attack, by demanding a surrender of the arms. It was at midnight. The demand was resisted by Mr. B. another man, and a boy, all the force that was in the house at the time, except the women, and not a musket loaded, out of the twenty or thirty stand which this valiant band had come to capture. Finding they could not obtain the arms, without at least the chance of taking ball with them, the party fled, after setting fire to one of the hay in the barn, leaving two dirks, and one of their party, Switzer, a prisoner. This fellow, a fit companion for such patriots, had been a tenant in our state prison. Switzer is the only one who has claim to being an American citizen, if indeed he has not forfeited this by his residence in Canada. I need not add there is a strong feeling of indignation pervading in this section among all classes, against the authors of this outrage."

[Burlington Sentinel.]

UPPER CANADA. The Brookville Recorder says that "it is now ascertained that the persons who robbed the mail were three in number, and not twelve as first reported. Their names are Robert Smith, otherwise Washington Mills (one of the late Robert Peel pirates), Decatur Johnson, (son to the celebrated Bill Johnson), and John Farrow, another of the Peel gang."

THE PRESIDENCY. The Southern Recorder, (a state rights paper in Georgia), announces the name of George M. Troup as a candidate for this station, and says, in doing so, it is in anticipation of gov. Troup being nominated by the next legislature of Georgia.

The Columbus (Geo.) Sentinel remarks on this nomination, that the editors of the Recorder know full well that Mr. Clay cannot, in any event get the vote of Georgia; therefore, the only manner in which he can be served, if served at all, is by this ruse, which, if it succeeds, neutralizes the state, otherwise it must assuredly go for Mr. Van Buren.

The Charleston Mercury (a Calhoun paper) speaks of governor Troup as "the distinguished and renowned Georgian," but thinks he stands no chance of being elected, and that the nomination is clearly playing into Mr. Clay's hand. "If however," (says the Mercury), the states rights party of Georgia believe that there is no manner of choice between Mr. Clay and Mr. Van Buren, and that they are equally bad, then they are perfectly justifiable in eschewing the contest, and using their electoral vote for the purpose of paying a harmless compliment to a distinguished fellow citizen.

[American Sentinel.]

MR. CLAY. We learn that it is the intention of this distinguished statesman of the west to visit, in the course of this month, the lakes, Niagara and Saratoga Springs, which places he is marked, he has never yet seen, but which he has long desired to visit. It is his intention, we understand, to avoid being the occasion of any public demonstrations, and to pass as quietly through the country as possible. — Undoubtedly his warm-hearted friends will be desirous of doing him honor; but if they consult his wishes, they will not press him to accept of any public demonstration of their confidence and esteem, however strong may be their desire to manifest their feelings towards him. [U. S. Gazette.]

MR. WEBSTER. in consequence of his absence from this country, has authorized the publication of the following address:

To the people of Massachusetts. It is known that my name has been presented to the public, by a meeting of members of the legislature of the state, as a candidate for the office of president of the U. States, at the ensuing election. As it has been expected that a convention would be held in the autumn of this year, composed of delegates from the several states, I have hitherto thought proper not to anticipate, in any way, the results of that convention. But I am now out of the country, not to return, probably, much earlier than the period fixed for the meeting of the convention, and do not know what events may occur, in the meantime, which, if I were at home, might demand immediate attention from me. I desire, moreover, to act no part, which may tend to prevent a cordial and effective union among those, whose object I trust, is to maintain, unimpaired, the constitution of the country, and to uphold all its great interests, by a wise, prudent and patriotic administration of the government. These considerations have induced me to withdraw my name as a candidate for the office of president, at the next election.

DANIEL WEBSTER.

London, June 12, 1839.

The Philadelphia National Gazette, whig paper, in publishing this letter says:

"It must be observed that Mr. Webster is silent respecting the vice presidency, and the inference is fair that the nomination made by the anti-masonic convention of this state is not unacceptable."

JOHN C. CALHOUN. We have received a copy of the reply of Mr. Calhoun, to an invitation from the committee of arrangements, to deliver the fourth of July oration in this city. [N. Y. New Era, Fort Hill, June 12, 1839.]

GENTLEMEN: I have been honored by your note of the 25th of May (received the 9th instant) informing me that delegates of the democratic republican party, from the several wards of your city, had selected me to deliver the oration at the approaching anniversary of independence.

I acknowledge with gratitude the honor of being selected by so numerous and respectable a portion of my fellow citizens in a distant section of the union on such an occasion, and am duly sensible of the obligation which it imposes; but the great distance and my numerous and indispensable engagements render it utterly impossible for me to accept.

Among other grounds to which you have alluded, you have referred to the part I have recently taken in the senate, as one of the causes of that favorable opinion towards me which had led to the intended honor that I am reluctantly compelled to decline.— Permit me to say, in taking the resolution to which you refer, there were difficulties of the most formidable character in the way, but had they been far greater, they could not have deterred me from the course I took, so imperious was the sense of duty under which I acted. The currency was no new question with me. For many years it had been the subject of my reflection, and the source of deep solicitude, and I had made up my mind when the time arrived, that would force it on the attention of the country and government, as to the part I would take if then on the stage of action.

The derangement to which our country is subjected is not accidental. It is inherent in the system itself, and in spite of every effort to correct it, will grow from bad to worse, until some great and radical change is effected. In the meantime, the community is destined to pass through scenes of difficulty and danger greater than any heretofore experienced, unless the people should be timely aroused to apply an efficient remedy to the growing disorders. I hold it almost impossible that there should be any state of things more corrupting to morals, more dangerous to free institutions, or more paralyzing to industry, than an uncertain, vascillating currency, under the control of private cupidity, such as ours is; and I am amazed, that the wealthy capitalists, whose property exists in stocks and securities, are not the first to see it and take the alarm. They ought to see that the gains from the irregular working of such a system must be but momentary and fallacious; and must be followed by a storm, if permitted to progress, which will sweep away such a system as leaves before a tornado. In taking my stand against the system, no partial or local considerations governed me. I stood up for what I honestly and sincerely believed to be the morality, the freedom and prosperity of the country, actuated by enmity to no class or section, but believing that I was acting the part of a true friend of all those who for the time were its victims.

Whether in this I was mistaken, I am content to leave to time and experience to decide. Thus far I have seen nothing to shake my opinion, but much to confirm it, much to animate me to perseverance in the course I have taken, till an effectual remedy is applied to this among the most dangerous evils that can befall the country.

For the very kind manner in which you have communicated the wishes of those you represent, you will please accept my sincere acknowledgments. I cannot but be highly gratified to learn that many of my old friends in your great metropolis have not forgotten me, and I do assure you that few things would afford me more pleasure than would an opportunity to renew my acquaintance with them, as well as to form it with those more recent friends whose approbation I have been so fortunate as to gain, in the trying scenes through which I have more recently passed.

Though circumstances will not permit me to accept the honor proffered, and to be present at your celebration, it will not I trust be considered an intrusion to offer the following sentiment:

"Equally, in its broadest sense, of rights and privileges between citizen and citizen, pursuit and pursuit, and one portion of the country and another, the deep and solid foundation of our political fabric; preserve that, and all is safe—destroy it, and the whole will rush to dust."

To Richard J. Smith, Steven R. Harris, and C. H. Dougherty, esqrs.

MESSRS. WISE AND PLEASANTS. We take pleasure in complying with the request to publish the following arrangement of a personal difficulty, the existence of which must have been a source of regret to the friends of the parties involved:

Richmond, June 24, 1839.

To the editors of the Norfolk Herald:

Gentlemen: The enclosed paper gives the best explanation of itself. As the letter to which it refers was published in your paper, it has been thought most appropriate by the friends of Messrs. Wise and Pleasants, that the paper now sent should be published there also. Will you have the goodness to publish it? I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES LYONS.

We have seen, with great regret, the personal collision that has occurred between Mr. Wise and Mr. Pleasants; and being entirely convinced from communication with them both, that it has grown out of a misapprehension on Mr. Wise's part of the meaning of Mr. Pleasants in an editorial article published in the Whig by him, we have thought it our duty to interpose for the purpose of bringing about an adjustment of the difference, honorable to both parties; and our mediation has been accepted by them.

Mr. Wise, as we know from his own assurance and as, indeed, his letter in the Norfolk Herald on the subject sufficiently evinces, thought that the editorial article in the Whig might be intended as a taunting and unfeeling allusion to the part which he bore in the duel between Mr. Graves and Mr. Cilley, and it was under the influence of that belief, and the excitement thereby occasioned, that he applied those personal and highly offensive remarks to Mr. Pleasants, to be found in the Herald; remarks which, we are sure, did not express Mr. Wise's deliberate opinions of Mr. Pleasants and his feelings towards him.

Now we are convinced, both from the article in the Whig itself, and from conversation with Mr. Pleasants, without his being apprised of the purpose with which we sought it, that Mr. Pleasants, in penning that article, entertained no feeling whatever of disrespect or unkindness towards Mr. Wise, and in particular, never had a thought of making any such allusion as that supposed; on the contrary he meant only a rebuke, and a sportive rebuke, of what he considered Mr. Wise's "impracticability" on the subject of the senatorial election.

Mr. Wise having used highly offensive and injurious language towards Mr. Pleasants, under an entire misapprehension (as we take upon us to assure him it was) of Mr. Pleasants' meaning—we think he ought not to hesitate to express, what we do not doubt he will feel, his regret for having used such language, and to retract it; and that thereupon the parties should be restored to the relation of mutual and cordial respect and good will toward each other.

B. W. LEIGH,
ROBERT STANARD,
JAMES LYONS.

We have seen the above, and very cheerfully adopt it as the adjustment of the misunderstanding that has arisen between us.

H. A. WISE,
JOHN H. PLEASANTS.

VICKSBURG COMMERCIAL AND RAIL ROAD BANK. The following statement of Mr. R. M. Whitney will be read with interest as throwing some light on the condition and management of the Commercial and Rail Road bank of Vicksburg; also the prospects of the fertile state of Mississippi.

Philadelphia, June 28, 1839.

To the publishers of the North American:
In your paper of yesterday, speaking of the decline that took place the day previous in the price of the stock of the Commercial and Rail Road bank of Vicksburg, you say: "This heavy fall of over $3 per share since yesterday, is attributed to a letter said to be written by Mr. R. M. Whitney, addressed to the stockholders, and representing things in a bad condition. It certainly requires some such elucidation to account for so heavy a decline in one day."

The letter in question was principally for the purpose of repelling assaults made on me individually, in a letter addressed to Henry Toland, esq. and others signed by the cashier and two of the present directors of the bank, which I did not see or know of until after my return to this place from Vicksburg.

In the letter referred to I said in conclusion, I deem it my duty to state, that "the result of all my enquiries on the point in which the stockholders are most deeply interested, (the restoration of the bank to sound condition, to prosperity and usefulness), was this—with an entire change of the present administration of the bank, and the adoption of the proper and necessary measures, I was assured by some of those who were well acquainted with its affairs, that ultimately the losses would be very inconsiderable; but all agreed that, while the bank remains in charge of the present conductors, its affairs are getting and will continue to get worse and worse daily. From my own observations I should be inclined to confirm their opinions." I added:

"It is hardly possible for a person who does not witness it, to form any opinion whatever approaching the reality of the vast national resperative facilities which the state of Mississippi possesses. I fully believe that three crops at most will completely disenthral and regenerate it from the present pecuniary embarrasments."

I ask of you the favor to publish this in your paper of to-morrow morning, that there may be no misapprehension on the part of those interested, as to what I did say in the letter to which you have referred. Respectfully,
R. M. WHITNEY.

MARYLAND TOBACCO CROP OF 1839. The calculations on such an abundant crop of tobacco so generally made by the planters in the beginning of the season, we are told will not likely be realized. Owing to the extreme forwardness of the planting, the tobacco will not attain its ordinary size, and such two-thirds of the growing crops is now in such advanced state that it will probably reach the house by the fifteenth or twentieth August. Tobacco we are told is a plant that will not attain half its proper growth if planted so early as to mature by the fifteenth or twentieth of August, its growth during the fall months of September and October, being nearly twice as great as at any other time. When planted early it buttons early and is ready for topping when it has attained but half its proper growth, and when that operation takes place it ceases to grow any more. The consequence will be therefore that nothing like a full crop in weight will be made in this section of the country this year, and this seems to be the opinion of many intelligent and respectable planters with whom we have recently conversed. In addition to this we have been informed that more than a usual crop in quantity has not in fact been planted this year, as scarcely an individual planter can be found who has planted more than he has been in the habit of planting for years past. We mention this fact to correct an erroneous rumor which seems to prevail among the tobacco merchants in Baltimore, in relation to the inordinate size of the crop which will likely be made this year; a result, by the way, which no human wisdom can at this time ascertain with such certainty as would justify its proclamation in the newspapers as a truth, and which, therefore, could only have been so announced for the purpose of affecting the present prices of tobacco and reducing its value in the market.

We are surprised that every rumor of this sort, unfounded or not, should be so eagerly seized on by a portion of the press and turned against the planting interest, whilst the truth is kept back, and those things which make in their favor are rarely if ever published. [Marlboro, Ga.]

PUBLIC WORKS IN ILLINOIS. The Sangamon Journal, after noticing the recent sales made in N. York, by Messrs. Rawlings & Oakley of $300,000 of the state bonds, says: "All the immediately available means which can be realised from these sales, has been used for the payment of interest on loans previously made—consequently no funds can be derived from these sources, for carrying on the public works, until about the 15th of August next, at which time $50,000 will be received by the Illinois bank in New York bank paper, which will be discounted in the same description of funds."

Mr. Tillson, before this time, has reached New York with a quantity of state bond. He will make an effort to raise money on them, for present purposes.

Should gov. Carlin's embassy to Europe, fail in obtaining funds, our state is likely to be embarrassed; and though the administration party are determined that there shall be no call of the legislature, they will find that public opinion cannot thus be trifled with, with impunity.

EARTHEN HOUSES AND EARTHEN FENCES. We learn from the Prairie (Illinois) Beacon, that the experiment of earthen houses has been introduced into St. Clair county, in that state, by a Mr. Potter, who has erected several buildings, (one of them a large two story dwelling house) the walls of which are composed entirely of earth, and they are said to be as handsome, and apparently as durable, as those made of brick, while the cost is much less. Mr. P. recommends the construction of fences of this kind in Illinois, the soil of the prairies being very similar to that of the plains of South America and Mexico, where such fences (called in those countries, pisé fences) and houses are, and have been for ages, very common. It requires but little skill to construct a house or a fence of this material. The earth is made into a kind of mortar, and planks being placed so as to form a sort of a box, as far apart as the walls are intended to be in thickness, is thrown in and pounded hard. This method of making fences and building houses must be very advantageous where as on the great western prairies, timber is scarce and earth is plenty.

GREAT FIRE AT EASTPORT, MAINE. A fire broke out on the 6th at this place, and destroyed one-half the property of the town, comprising more than forty-one places of public business. It commenced at No. 3 Water street, sweeping off every building on both sides of the street, to the store of the Messrs. Hobbs.

Every wharf in the neighborhood was cleared except the two stores of the lower end of Hayden's wharf—Central wharf, Union wharf, Steamboat wharf and Hobbs's wharf. Two vessels, the Martha and the Abigail, were totally destroyed, having been aground in the dock, and several others took fire, but were extinguished.

The list of sufferers is numerous, chiefly merchant dealers in West India dry goods, flour and corn, hat stores, jewellers, tailors, shoemakers, and every species of mechanics. The slip of the Eastport Sentinel says:

"Nothing remains of what was yesterday the centre, and in fact nearly the circumference of the business part of the town, but a heap of ruins, above which rise the blackened chimneys of the burnt buildings,—and over which the smoke rests like a pall, as if to hide the heinous mass beneath. Since writing the above, an estimate has been made of the property destroyed, which is put at $240,000, of which $50,000 are supposed to be insured."

THE NEW YORK SUNDAY SCHOOL JUBILEE.

We subjoin from the New York Sun, a notice of the most interesting celebration of independence day that we have yet met with, a festival in which no less than fifteen or twenty thousand children participated. In publishing the statement, it may be as well first to give from the Journal of Commerce an account of the preparations made on the occasion. These were for the accommodation of this Lilliputian army:

- 4 steamboats.
- 9 towboats, averaging 400 tons each.
- 2,300 lbs. of corned beef, boiled.
- 200 neats' tongues.
- 6 pigs, roasted whole.
- 2,300 loaves of bread.
- 20 bbls. of sugar and butter crackers.
- 40 bbls. of pure water.

The Sabbath schools were—Undoubtedly the most interesting and pleasing of the incidents of the 4th, was the "patriotic festival" of the Sabbath schools of this city, held at Staten Island. And a glorious incident too, will it ever be, in the history of these United States. Who would credit the assertion, that fifteen thousand belonging to Sabbath schools of this city, met at the rendezvous on the island? Accompanied by delegations from some of the neighboring towns, and with the schools of the island, amounting in all, to about twenty thousand!

The following, as nearly as we can ascertain, was the order of arrangement for the day. The Sabbath schools assembled at an early hour, at their respective places of meeting; as soon as organized, they proceeded to the places of embarkation, viz: foot of Hubert street, on the North river side, and foot of Pike street, East river. At the moment the boats left the wharf, "Hail Columbia, happy land," burst forth simultaneously from many thousand voices. The effect was enchanting, and a glorious sight were those splendid steamers and barges so tastefully decorated and shaded with evergreen, and the children all decked in holiday attire, looking so joyous in anticipation of their delightful exercises.

When the song was ended, and all was hushed, the voice of prayer was heard in each boat. The jubilee hymn was then sung; and recitations by young orators, with odes prepared for the occasion, occupied the remainder of the time, till the boats reached the island. A more exciting scene can hardly be imagined, than that presented by the disembarkation of so many thousands, and the intertwining among the green hills of Staten to the rendezvous, amidst the wavings of banners, and bursts of music.

In the midst of the woods was raised a large tent, where the president of the United States and governor Seward were received, with the officers appointed for the occasion. Other large tents were erected around this principal one, and when all were seated, dinner was served up, if we may so express it. Recitations, singing, salutary speeches by the youth, and music by the two bands, occupied the time till 3 o'clock, when all re-embarked for home.—A short excursion was made down the bay; salutes were fired from ships at anchor, and returned by deafening "hurrahs" from the barges. A more enlightening scene was never witnessed. About six o'clock the Sabbath schools disembarked in safety at New York, not one accident having happened among the congregating of so many thousands.

SCHOOL. The school fund of Kentucky amounts to one million of dollars, besides the appropriations which have been made to the Transylvania university at different times, to the sum of one hundred and seventy thousand dollars. We notice the latter endowment with the more pleasure because there appears to be, in some parts of the country, a disposition on the part of legislative authorities to neglect collegiate institutions while a very commendable attention is paid to common schools. We do not know, however, that Maryland has done much for either. No system of schools can be complete that does not provide for liberal education, as well as for ordinary instruction. Pennsylvania, with a truly enlightened policy, in addition to very numerous appropriations to common schools throughout the state, has granted one thousand dollars annually to every collegiate institution in the commonwealth that maintains four professors and one hundred students.—Every classical academy of a certain grade receives five hundred dollars a year, and minor schools in proportion. The state cannot fail to reap rich benefits from a system such as this, permanently established. The common schools will be supplied with able teachers from the higher institutions, and these latter will draw an increasing number of pupils from the subordinate seminaries. The state of Ohio deserves honorable mention also, on account of the attention which education has received from those in authority. Professor Stowe, who was commissioned by governor Lucas to visit Prussia for the purpose of examining the school system of that kingdom, has published a very interesting report, which, as we desire information on such subjects, will find their account in perusing.

THE WESTERN LAKES. The growth of towns along the shores of our great lakes is unexampled in the history of the world. And what most surprises the stranger is the character of the results; as if swayed by the magic influence ascribed to the fabled lamp of Aladdin, the wilderness seems in a moment to change its native aspect, and literally to rise into cities. Well paved streets, long blocks of brick and stone buildings, and elegantly finished stores, supplied with all the necessaries and luxuries of life, distinguish most of these western towns from the earlier years of their infancy, and the eye of the traveller dwells with pleasure upon massive structures and specimens of architectural elegance which would do credit to old and long established communities. The following table, published in the Cleveland Herald, though perhaps not correct in all its details, may convey an adequate idea of the general rates of increase. The population of places in the west is apt to be over estimated—that of Cleveland, I think, is too high, while that of Detroit certainly, and probably that of Chicago, fall below the true estimate. It will serve, however, to show that the aggregate population of the towns, whose names are given, have quadrupled, or nearly so, in the short space of eight years.

Buffalo,	8,653	20,000
Erie,	1,328	3,500
Cleveland,	1,076	8,400
Sandusky city,	400	1,500
Lower Sandusky,	150	500
Perrysburg,	182	680
Maumee,	250	2,000
Toledo,	30	2,000
Detroit,	2,122	6,500
Monroe,	500	3,500
Chicago,	100	5,000
Milwaukee,	20	3,500
Michigan city,	10	1,000
Newburyport,	10	1,580
Navarino,	100	1,500
Huron,	10	1,500
Dunkirk,	50	1,500

It should be remarked, however, that towns have been greatly depopulated from sickness or other causes, the inhabitants removing to more healthy or more eligible locations. The population of Michigan city, for instance, was once set down at 2,000, while that of Toledo does not perhaps at present equal 1,000. A feeling of state pride has rather exaggerated the condition of the Ohio towns in the above list, and underrated some of those in the other states; the aggregate, however, is not far from correct. There are said to be as many as thirty towns, not named above, that commenced their existence since 1830, which would greatly swell the ratio of increase. With regard to business during the same period, I gather from the same paper, that the number of vessels that cleared from the port of Cleveland, with cargoes, in 1830 was 827; in 1838 it was 3,028. The value of exports in 1830 was $377,197, and in 1838 the value of exports that arrived by the canal alone exceeded five millions of dollars. The value of imports in 1830 was less than one million, and in 1838 was estimated at over nine millions. If these estimates are at all to be relied on, they exhibit an increase in population and trade unexampled in the history of the world.

INDIAN NAMES. Whatever contrariety of opinion may exist concerning the adoption of a national title for the whole union, there ought to be no diversity of sentiment, we think, touching the propriety of retaining the Indian names, wherever they are in use throughout the country, and of restoring them wherever they have been supplanted. Words of such sonorous melody, of such exceeding good report—deserve to be treasured if it were only for their sound's sake. But how much more precious—nay how endearing do they become when the associations are called to mind which blend them with the rivers, mountains, lakes and valleys of this great country! They will soon be the only evidences that remain of a people now passing away—a people uncivilized indeed, but heroic beyond the savages of any other clime—fit associates of the majestic hills, the dark forests and floods of their primeval home, and worthy to be the tenants of a region where nature has stamped the impress of sublimity in her own ever enduring characters. There is a fitness—a justice, both moral and poetical, in continuing to every hill, stream and glen, the name which first it bore.

It would be almost impossible to find more beautiful names than those which have been retained of Indian origin, to many of our rivers and mountainous ranges. Among native tribes whose words are formed from some inward correspondence, fanciful or real, between the name and the thing denoted, there is generally found a singular appropriateness of epithets. Either the name indicates some quality of the object, or it is the echo of sounds connected therewith. Niagara, uttered in Indian gutturals, would be a very unfit appellation for a softly flowing stream—such for example as the Monongahela—a name which suits well with the "liquid lapse of waters."

The restoring of the old Indian names to places which are now designated by some mean or second hand cognomen, was dwelt upon by Mr. Irving in his essay on the subject, as a distinct matter from that of a national name. The institution of a special association for this purpose was deemed by him to be more than worthy the importance of the undertaking would justify. With a society of this kind, composed of literary and distinguished men, individuals in different parts of the country might correspond; and the efforts of each towards the recovery of ancient appellations would be made in concert and receive the sanction of respectable authority. By referring to the old land deeds and papers, lodged in the various record offices throughout the several states, as has been suggested, much might be done in the way of bringing to light long forgotten terms. It is hardly probable that any general agreement can be had on a national title. But this other matter is something upon which every man of taste in the country would unite if there were any prospect of successful action. [Amer.]

FRENCH AND ENGLISH. We occupy a great deal of time in eating and drinking, and sit here at table, while the French rise directly nature is satisfied and proceed to their employment. The two sexes separate with us, but the French men and women, at all times and on all subjects alike discuss together. No women have shown so much character, been so little given to fritter away their time as the French. They instituted the order of the Soeurs de la Marie; madame Roland de la Tour, founded an order of Recluses, who shut themselves up all their lives in a cave, to lament some irreparable affliction. The maid of Orleans, Charlotte Corday, madame Roland of the revolution, are instances of enthusiasm; madame Dacier, marquise Chatelet, madame de Staël, show a depth of scientific learning, almost confined to the industry of men. If you read some of the writings of the authoresses of the present, like madame Dunevant, you will believe we never have had a woman so female, so masculine in her character. The females exercise all the occupations and gain the emolument of men; they keep the accounts; they are at the bourse, and evening table; they are behind the counter, they act as clerks and negotiators, and often in manufacturing towns get their 1,000f. But our ladies must talk scandal, our farmer's daughters leave the dairy, and play the piano. "But," say we, "the French are a trifling nation, because they think seriously about trifes, which make up the sum of life." Says an author: They have advanced every thing to the rank of a science or an art—whether cutting your hair, tying your cravat or cooking your dinner; they have inmanuals and instructions for every thing; and every thing worth doing at all they would do well, or to use their own term, they would be perfect in it. The French, of all nations are an occupied and busy people; they must be doing something; but we show disposition to trifle away our lives; to risk them in trifles; cockfights, boxing matches and steaple chases. We praise ourselves on being very charitable people.—What did we subscribe for the family of sir Walter Scott? Less than ten thousand pounds; the French more than forty thousand pounds for Foy, and the most splendid monument in Pere la Chaise. The English are scattered all over the continent; unable to fix their thought or their feet, running over every thing, considering nothing, and instanced for their levity; but the French can stay in their own country, and find amusement among themselves, unbidden by our mania of locomotion. Their journeys are generally undertaken for business, private and public or for education, or to make researches. They are pensioned by government or they are exiles; or they are on a tour of propaganda risking their lives in aid of their own parties or opinions, and in contentions of foreigners. The French show respect to the people of genius and learning in society, while we treat them with comparative indifference, so that a great astronomer of our country said that he never knew he was any body until he went abroad; and the way we treat the lions of one season, and forget them the next, certainly proves levity and puerile trifling in our character. We must, however, except the anniversaries of the scientific association, when all the lions are paraded about the country like other shows, and so well fed that, like the animals in the menageries, the best time for seeing them is the feeding time. A JOURNEYMAN PRINTER. Much has been said, and sung about the characteristics of "ramping journeyman printers," and the extraordinary vicissitudes which mark the progress of that most intelligent, though thriftless, race of mortals; but we believe the following extract of a letter, received from an old acquaintance of one of the editors of the Courier, indicates of versatility of accomplishments rarely equalled in these days:

"Look at the signature of this, and you will remember the person who addresses you. I met you together, who sat here about half an hour ago, and was informed by him that you will start to your place in half an hour. I have, of course, no time to say much. I am here by chance—met your brother by chance—and had a host of reminiscences awakened in my mind in a moment.

"Since I saw you last, I have experienced all the vicissitudes of fortune—at a moment a colonel of Texan cavalry—the next a prisoner among the Cumanches; at another, lieutenant aboard a Texan sloop of war—the next a prisoner among the Mexicans of Matamoros—finally a typo in —, under the weather! Can I serve you at Terre house, or can you serve me? If you have forgotten my qualifications, here they are: A practical printer—an experienced stenographer—a good English writer—a perfect French scholar, vocalist, and player on a Spanish guitar. If I can be of no use to you, write and say whether I can get a school in your neighborhood.

"When we last saw the writer of the above, in 1834, he was acting in the capacity of a reporter in congress, and the next time we heard of him was through an obituary notice in a New Orleans paper, detailing the circumstances of his sudden death.—Our readers may therefore imagine our surprise on receiving the post mortem evidence of remembrance from a gentleman whom the newspapers, 10 or 12 months since, had consigned to mother earth!

If the services of a gentleman so gifted, can be profitably employed by any of our contemporaries, we shall cheerfully communicate to them his address; for, we regret to say, we have no room for him in our own establishment. [Wash. Courier.]

FIFTY YEARS AGO. In these degenerate days it is sometimes useful to review the past, and compare the present with our former state. A friend has handed us a file of the "New Haven Gazette, and Connecticut Magazine," for the year 1787, published by Josiah Meigs, formerly professor of mathematics in Yale college, which contains a great many curious reminiscences. Among others we observe the following:

"TO BE SOLD,
"A healthy, strong and active NEGRO BOY, about 11 years of age.—Inquire of the printer."

"TO BE HANGED,
"A likely young negro, about 18 years of age. He is hanged for no fault, but for want of employ, and to preserve him from the greater evil of being sold as a slave for life. [New Haven Herald.]

THE REWARD OF FOLLY. A man was tried before the court in Salem, N. J. last week, for having been concerned in burgharics and robberies in Sharpstown. When brought to the bar he pleaded "guilty," and was sentenced for three cases of grand larceny, and three cases of petty larceny, to twenty years imprisonment in the state penitentiary. After sentence was passed upon him he stated that he had only been discharged from prison last March, where he had been confined several years, and that previous to that he had been a prisoner in the state penitentiary for four years, having been convicted of stealing a horse when but twelve years of age.—When his present term shall expire, he will have served thirty-one years out of about forty-five, in state penitentiaries. He will have served rather a long apprenticeship, and no doubt be very well skilled in the "art and mystery" of picking oakum or sawing stone, by the time he gets clear again.

CRIME IN FRANCE.—Out of every 106 persons accused, 61 are regularly condemned. Out of the whole population, 1 in every 4,460 inhabitants is accused. In every 100 crimes, 25 are against the person, 75 against the property. Experience shows that the number of murders is annually nearly the same; and what is still more singular, that the instruments or means employed, are also in the same proportion. The inclination to crime is at its maximum in man about the age of 25, in women 5 years later. The proportion of men and women accused is 3 to 1. The seasons have an influence on crime; in summer more crimes are committed against the person—fewer against property; the reverse is the case in the winter. The development to the inclination to crime agrees very perfectly with that of the passions and physical strength; and on the other hand, the development of reason tends to restrain the inclination. The greatest physical strength of man developed between the age of 30 and 35; and the greatest mental powers between that of 45 and 50. At this is the greatest number of chefs d'œuvre of French theatre has been produced. It is a singular contrast that about this age we find mental alienation most frequent and difficult.

VERMONT STATE CONVENTION.

Pursuant to the call of the state committee, the democratic whig convention of the state of Vermont assembled at Woodstock on Thursday, the 27th day of June, 1839. The convention was composed of delegates from every county in the state except Grand Isle, and was the largest political convention ever assembled in Vermont.

A committee appointed to present a nomination for officers for the convention, reported the following, and the several persons nominated were elected to the offices annexed to their respective names, to wit:

Norman Williams, esq. of Woodstock, president.
Honorable Ezra Meech, of Shelburne, honorable Timothy Follett, of Burlington, honorable Lemuel Whitney, of Brattleboro', hon. Moses Strong, of Rutland, hon. Charles Marsh, of Woodstock, Abner B. W. Tenny, esq. of Newbury, Amasa Pride, esq. of Waterbury, Timothy Goodale, esq. of Jamaica, Jonathan Hager, esq. of Middlebury, Erasmus Fairbanks, esq. of St. Johnsbury, vice-presidents.

Leonard Sergeant, esq. of Manchester, Dr. Witt C. Clarke, esq. of Brandon, A. G. Chadwick, esq. of St. Johnsbury, secretaries.

The committee appointed to present nominations for state officers reported that the committee unanimously recommend the following:

For governor, SILAS H. JENISON.

For lieutenant-governor, DAVID M. CAMP.

For treasurer, HENRY F. JAMES.

Which report the convention unanimously adopted.

Mr. Hopkins, from the committee appointed to prepare and report an address to the people, submitted an address, which was read, and, on motion of Mr. Burchard, of New Fane, unanimously adopted, and ordered to be published.

The committee on resolutions reported the following, which were read and adopted by the convention, to wit:

Resolved, That the establishment of republican principles in an epoch in the history of the world, and the faithful administration of these principles were the most effectually promote the improvement and happiness of the human race.

Resolved, That the danger of abuse arises from the corruptions of selfish politicians, and the neglect of the people in the exercise of the electoral franchise.

Resolved, That the evidences of the corruption of the rulers is found in the squandering of the public moneys, the abuse of executive patronage, of the press, and the control of public opinion, until the best of governments is in danger of being perverted to the worst of purposes.

Resolved, That the remedy is to be found in the faithful exercise of the admitted powers of the people, and that, by such exercise, all loco focism will be put down, and the nation saved.

Resolved, That no duty can be more important than the preservation of our institutions in their purity; and that at no time since the formation of the government has the call been more imperative for energy, decision and action, and that in the success of our opponents the consolidation of all power in the hands of the executive will be complete, the purse and the sword practically united, and the nation left to mourn its lost privileges, or seek to regain them by the dreadful remedy of revolution.

Resolved, That, as yet, all is safe; the people have the remedy in their own hands, and the virtue and intelligence to exercise it; and all that is requisite is, that they should be aroused to a sense of their danger. We call on the friends of liberty in Vermont to come out and help to free the nation from its threshold.

Resolved, That the great principles of human freedom and regulated liberty know no degree of latitude; and that, in the great efforts now in auspicious progress to restore the administration of the general government to the principles of the constitution, there is no north or south; nothing save the solution of the problem that "man is capable of self-government."

Resolved, That the attempt to introduce into this state political clubs or associations, the offshoots of the "bay state association," originating with the Boston custom house, and to be controlled by custom house officers and other partisan leaders, ought to excite the indignation of every citizen who has any respect for the farewell injunctions of Washington, or any just sense of the horrors produced by the jacobin clubs of France.

Resolved, That the numbers and character of the unshackled freemen of Vermont, assembled on the present occasion, afford a sufficient guaranty that the people are fully alive to the present crisis; that they will manfully and successfully resist any new demonstrations that the often discomfited forces of the administration, however aided by such associations or government officials, may make upon us.

Resolved, That the congressional elections thus far warrant confident expectations of a decisive whig majority in the next house of representatives; affording a clear indication that the public sentiment has undergone a material change within the last two years, and affording strong hopes that, by union, energy and concert, our beloved country may be rescued from the hands of the spoilers, who have never hesitated to sacrifice the best interests of the nation to promote their selfish partisan schemes.

Resolved, That this convention do concur with the late whig convention of Pennsylvania in the adoption of the following preamble and resolutions:

Whereas the great object of this assembly, and of all representative assemblies for the selection of candidates, is to ascertain which of the citizens before the public is the one believed to be the best qualified for the station to be filled, and most likely to be acceptable to the party whose representatives are thus assembled:

And whereas it is of incalculable importance to the liberty and happiness of the people of these United States that the office of president shall, at the approaching election, be conferred on some individual who will have courage and principle to remove corrupt and incompetent men from office, and appoint honest ones in their places; to prevent a repetition of the many outrageous acts of misrule and misconduct which for the last ten years have disgraced the people and the government; and thus provide effectually against the further plunder of the public treasure, and the flight and impunity of the plunderers, of such frequent occurrence under the present and late administrations of the general government; whereby the hard-earned tooney of the people has been squandered, and the character of the nation injured in the estimation of the world: And whereas, in order to secure the success of such a candidate, it is greatly to be desired, and it is indispensably necessary, that the whole strength of the opposition to the administration of Mr. Van Buren shall be united, and that all the votes be cast in favor of some one candidate:

And whereas the democratic whig party throughout the union are so thoroughly satisfied of the necessity which exists for a reformation in the principles and practices of the administration of the general government, that they have at every meeting, whether aggregate or representative, which has been held, in language the most unequivocal and unreserved, pledged themselves to give up all personal preferences, and heartily unite in support of such candidate as shall be selected by the national convention which is to assemble at Harrisburg in December next:

Resolved, That it be strenuously recommended to the national democratic whig convention which is to assemble at Harrisburg in December next, to consider no man's name before that body for nomination as a candidate for the office of president of the United States, who shall not be pledged to withdraw it, and decline a poll, if his name shall not be the name selected as that of the candidate of the party.

Resolved, That it is respectfully, yet with all earnestness, recommended to the national convention, when they shall have selected the candidate of the party for the office of president of the United States, to pledge themselves, in an address to the people of the United States, signed with the name of every member, that they will with all zeal and in good faith support the candidate selected.

Resolved, as the opinion of this convention, that, with frankness and in good faith, its members pledge themselves to support, by all honorable means, the candidate who shall be selected by the national convention.

Resolved, That the principles detailed, and the course of conduct set forth in this preamble and resolutions, will make absolutely certain the election of the candidate who shall be nominated at Harrisburg, thus fatally and signally overthrowing and ousting from office the men who have so much abused the public confidence, endeavorers to corrupt the public mind and the public press, and dishonors of the country, by the appointment of unworthy agents in foreign nations.

Resolved, That the president of this convention be, and he hereby is, requested to take the earliest opportunity of causing this preamble and resolution to be placed in the hands of the president of the national convention, with a request that he will lay them before that assembly.

Mr. Meech, from the committee on nominations, reported the names of the following gentlemen to represent the state in the approaching national convention:

Messrs. George T. Hodges and David M. Camp, as delegates at large; and Messrs. E. N. Briggs and Eraslas Fairbanks as substitutes; and those gentlemen were thereupon appointed.

RECEPTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

New York, July 3, 1839.

DEAR SIR: Yesterday the president of the United States made his entry into our city. His reception was brilliant in the extreme, and fully equalled that of general Jackson. It far exceeded our most sanguine expectations. The concourse of people, the eloquence, and his appearance was every where hailed by loud and enthusiastic cheering.

He landed at the battery about 1 P. M. On his passage across the river, he received salutes from the North Carolina, the forts of the bay, and from the battery. At Castle Garden he was received by a committee of his fellow citizens, and was addressed by them. The address and reply you will see in the Post this afternoon. He then reviewed the military on duty, amounting to several thousands, and a long line of citizens on horseback. Here the crowd was so great, that it was almost impossible for him to move; hundreds pushed forward to take him by the hand, and thousands made the "welkin ring" with their shouts.

A procession was then formed by the military and by the citizens on horseback and in carriages. The whole line of march through the city was about two miles, and the procession reached at least half the distance.

The people in the procession, however, constituted but a very small portion of the immense concourse which filled our streets, until they seemed paved with human heads. At every step of the way the cheers were loud and continued. During the whole distance the windows and house tops, and every other spot capable of containing a human being, were full of people—men shouting and women waving their handkerchiefs.

So dense was the crowd, that the procession was compelled to move very slow, and it was not until 5 o'clock that he was able to reach our City Hall, where he was received by the mayor and common council, and remains as his guest during his stay in the city.

At the hall he was surrounded by thousands upon thousands, and it was nearly two hours before he could get away and reach his quarters.

He will remain here until next Thursday, when he will leave for the north.

The friends of Mr. Van Buren have every reason to be satisfied with his reception. It was warm, cordial and enthusiastic, and was by as immense a mass of people as ever assembled in this city on any occasion. As an opposition paper says, this morning, "it was in every sense of the word a triumphant entry, and it would be worse than foolish to deny the fact. It was an extraordinary scene, the most so since the visit of general Jackson to this city." [Globe.]

From the New York Evening Post of July 3.

An enthusiastic and hearty welcome was given to the president of the United States on his arrival in this city about one o'clock yesterday afternoon. The people began to assemble in crowds in the neighborhood of the Park and Tammany Hall at an early hour of the day. Several companies of the military formed about 11 o'clock in front of the City Hall, whence they proceeded shortly afterwards to the Battery to join the other companies which were already stationed there.

Early in the morning the democratic young men's committee, (followed by the committee of arrangements from Tammany Hall) had gone on horseback to New Jersey for the purpose of receiving the president at Newark. Of their proceedings while there, not having been present, we copy an account from the New Era of this morning:

On arriving at Newark, we saw the whole of that charming city ardently animated with its assembled population, and in beautiful equestrian array with committees from the townships of the county, and from Jersey City. The windows and galleries of the houses were filled with women, whilst the streets were thronged with the male portion of the citizens and visitors.

"The president arrived in the railroad cars at half past 9 o'clock, A. M. and was received with a simultaneous shout of welcome from the dense multitude of people which surrounded him. On being escorted to the hotel, he was greeted with repeated cheers. Here the various committees and many hundreds of other citizens were introduced to him, after which collations prepared for the occasion, at which the mayor of Newark presided, and many complimentary and patriotic toasts, appropriate to the occasion, were drank with the most gratifying unanimity. At a quarter before eleven o'clock, the president and procession of vehicles and equestrians which extended apparently more than a mile in length, departed from Jersey City amidst cheers that were heard from afar, and clouds of waving handkerchiefs and banners. At the several villages of Bergen county in his way, Mr. Van Buren was honored with repeated salutes of cannon procured for the occasion, and by the cordial greetings of the people. The husbandmen in the fields, and the artisans from the workshops, came forth in groups and significantly welcomed him as a friend in whom they trusted."

When the president arrived at Jersey City he was received by the mayor and common council of that place, by the democratic republican general committee, and a deputation from the New York common council. After partaking of the collation prepared for the occasion, he repaired, in company with a large number of invited guests, to the steamboat Utica, to be conveyed to Castle Garden, where thousands of his fellow citizens were collected to congratulate him on his first visit for many years to his native state. The steamboat, after winding gracefully for some time among the vessels that thronged the bay, approached the North Carolina seventy-four then lying in the stream with her yards covered by rows of sailors in white uniforms, and was greeted by a double broadside salute of forty-four pound guns, followed by the repeated cheers of the crew, and re-echoed by the deafening cannon of the batteries both on the water and the land. The salute from the seventy-four was returned by the forts on Bedloe's island, Staten island, and Governor's island, and by the several artillery companies placed on the Battery; for more than half an hour the whole atmosphere was filled with the smoke and rent by the thunder of the continued discharge of cannon.

Mr. Van Buren, after landing at Castle Garden, was escorted to the spacious saloon of the building where he was received by the mayor and common council, the democratic republican general committee in full, by the committee of arrangements, and an immense concourse of citizens. He was then eloquently addressed by Mr. John W. Edmonds, chairman of the committee appointed by the convention of citizens, to which the president briefly and pertinently replied.

[The address of Mr. Edmonds and the president's reply were inserted in our last—pages 298 and 299.]

The scene from Castle Garden during these ceremonies was in the highest degree imposing. On one side was the bay spread out in a calm and beautiful sheet of water, covered with vessels of every sort gaily decorated and alive with human beings; to the north lay the shipping, with its forest of masts and the flags of all nations, surrounded by the ensign of the American republic, waving in the breeze; on the other side was the vast area of the Battery, which seemed like one dense mass of men, with every post and every tree occupied, whilst far in the distance the long line of coach tops and house tops was covered with eager and animated spectators.

At the conclusion of the ceremonies in the garden, the president, mounted on a very graceful and spirited black horse, reviewed the six thousand troops gathered on the Battery, when they were formed into ranks, and the procession began slowly to move up Broadway, surrounded on all sides by multitudes of persons of both sexes and all ages.—The line of march was from Broadway up Chatham street and the Bowery, through Broton street into Broadway again, from whence it returned to the Park, where the assemblage was dismissed, and the president took his leave of the people for the day, amid reiterated hurrahs.

Wherever the interminable procession passed, it was hailed by the cheers of the throngs collected upon the side walks, by the waving handkerchiefs of the ladies who crowded the balconies and windows, and by the shouts and gestures of groups who hung upon the very eaves of the houses. A succession of thronged heads continued along the whole course that the vast body advanced. A more animated spectacle has not been seen in this city since the landing, in 1824, of general Lafayette.—The number of persons gathered together is variously estimated from one hundred thousand to one hundred and fifty thousand. It was the spontaneous tribute of the people to the chief magistrate of fifteen millions of freemen.

It is to be recorded as a matter worthy of note, that notwithstanding the rushing of the crowds, the jostling of carriages, and the firing of cannon, not an accident of any kind occurred during the day.—The most perfect propriety of demeanor was observed by every person on the ground without the interference or even presence of the police.

WHALE FISHERY.

From the New York Evening Post.

We publish to-day for the information of our commercial readers two documents connected with this subject. The one is a circular from the comptroller of the treasury, under date of the 22d of June, to which is appended the opinion of Mr. Justice Story, out of which the embarrassment has arisen, and the other is a copy of a letter from the secretary of the treasury to a committee of merchants at New Bedford, under date of the 29th June.

In the perusal of the papers the reader cannot fail to discover the anxious desire of the officers of the treasury to observe the law, as expounded by the judicial, and at the same time to give all the relief in their power to those who may be injuriously affected by the position referred to. When the decisions of the courts are favorable to the merchants, they are not slow in calling upon the officers of the government to follow out the decision in practical detail, but when they are adverse to the present pecuniary interests of that class, there are, to their shame be it spoken, conductors of newspapers to be found who will make this the occasion to utter the grossest abuse of all the officers of the revenue, from the secretary of the treasury down to the lowest tide waiter. This course is not the best one to vindicate the dignity of the laws, or to encourage a liberal construction of them on the part of those who are charged with their execution. All men are liable to err in the interpretation of the laws as well as in their motives, and charity, a Christian virtue, (very much out of fashion, by the by) ought to lead us to suppose, unless there is manifest proof to the contrary, that errors of this kind do not arise from bad motives.

CIRCULAR SUPPLEMENTARY TO COLLECTORS, NAVAL OFFICERS AND SURVEYORS.

Treasury department.

First comptroller's office, June 22, 1839.

Sir: Inquiries having been made of this department on the part of some of the collectors of those districts to which registered whaling vessels belong, in relation to the particular duties and penalties to be imposed on such of said vessels and their cargoes as may return to port without having the requisite papers in force it is found expedient that you should be informed:—

1. That if a whaling vessel come into port not having been enrolled and licensed, as by the recent decision of Mr. Justice Story, she cannot be considered a vessel entitled to the privileges of an American vessel employed in the fisheries, you have no alternative but to exact alien duty on the cargo, if it be subject to duty, according to the rates in force, and on the tonnage of the vessel, that is to say, one dollar per ton, being fifty cents per ton for tonnage duty and fifty cents per ton for light money; the act of March 27, 1804, making the collection of light money consequent on the imposition of alien tonnage duty.

2. That a whaling vessel, under like circumstances, is not considered subject to the hospital tax, inasmuch as the act of July 16, 1793, imposes the tax only on the crews of vessels on the United States, and the recent decision of Mr. Justice Story determining a registered whaler not to be such a vessel in contemplation of law, she is consequently exempt from the tax.

3. That the sixth section of the act of 18th February, 1793, in relation to the enrolling and licensing of vessels to be employed in the coasting trade or fisheries, having especial reference to vessels found trading between district and district, or between different places in the same district, it is the opinion of this department, taking into view the proviso in the fourth section of the act of March 1, 1817, that a registered whaling vessel does not come within the operation of the first mentioned section as respects the forfeiture by sailing from one port of the United States to another port thereof, with the fruits of her enterprise, say oil and bone, or with such cargo as may have been taken in by her at a foreign port, for the purpose of delivering the several portions of said cargo according to its destination, but she will be liable to tonnage duties and light money at every port of arrival.

4. That although under these circumstances a registered whaling vessel may readily avoid incurring a forfeiture, the exaction of alien duties of tonnage and impost being an inevitable consequence of the recent decision of Mr. Justice Story, it is conceived that no officer of the government has a right to undertake the remission of said duties, and therefore in such cases, if relief be sought, a protest should be filed, and application being made to congress to obtain it, the collection of the duty bonds will probably be postponed till congress decides.

5. That whaling vessels enrolled and licensed, and having permission to touch and trade at a foreign port, are not on their arrival subject to the hospital tax, within the meaning of the act of 1793, if it shall appear that they have not used such permission further than to procure the necessary supplies; but if they on coming into port have foreign goods on board, as it will then be manifest that they have been engaged in trading abroad, within the fair meaning of the term, it is conceived that the tax should be collected of the crews according to the provisions of the act before cited.

6. That in view of the ancient usage at some of the ports, and until congress shall have an opportunity to legislate on the subject, the circular of the 6th instant, to which this is additional, is not to be considered as having reference to the case of any registered whaling vessel whose cargo has passed on board a house before you received it, unless such case was specially presented to the department, and decided upon.

It would be most gratifying to the department if it could feel itself authorised, under existing laws, to extend, in other respects, further immediate relief, to those engaged in the whale fisheries. But whatever may have been its opinions from time to time expressed on special cases not involving the questions now at issue, or the inferences drawn from those opinions, or however it may be presumed to have acquiesced during former years in erroneous practice, introduced and extended so silently and gradually as at no time to excite its special notice, it cannot now, when its attention is called to the subject by a judicial decision, hesitate to sustain the officers of the customs in carrying out the clear and explicit construction of the law as given by Mr. Justice Story, until congress think proper to amend it.

A copy of the opinion as furnished to this office, is hereto appended for your information.

I have only to add that the secretary of the treasury concurs in these views. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. N. BARKER, comptroller.

United States vs. Wm. Rogers and others, June term, 1838—of Newport.

Indictment against the defendants for an endeavor to commit a revolt on the 10th of May, 1835, on board the brig Troy, belonging to Bristol, R. Island, alleged to be a registered ship, owned by certain citizens of the United States, raised in the indictment, and the defendants being seamen in and on board thereof, against the act of 3d of March, 1835, ch. 40. Plea, not guilty.

At the trial it was admitted by Greene, the district attorney, that the brig was at the time when the supposed offence was committed, (May, 1835), engaged in a whaling voyage, and her crew were, by the shipping articles, in the same year shipped for a whaling voyage. The ship's register was lated in 1833, and the voyage was undertaken without any surrender of the register, or taking out an enrollment and license pursuant to the act of 18th February, 1793, ch. 52, for enrolling and licensing vessels employed in the coasting trade and fisheries.

Upon this statement, which was agreed to be the truth of the case, the court suggested a doubt whether the offence, if any, was, under the circumstances, within the purview of the statute; and the case was spoken to by Greene, district attorney, Randolph and Pearce being counsel for the defendants.

Story, J.—I am unable to persuade myself that the present indictment is maintainable under the circumstances. The act of 1835, ch. 40, provides that "if any one or more of the crew of an American ship or vessel on the high seas, &c. shall endeavor to make a revolt, he, she, or they, shall, on conviction, be punished as provided for in the act." To bring the case within the statute, the voyage or which the seamen are shipped must be a lawful one, and they must at the time be of the "crew" of an American ship or vessel; and, of course, there must exist a lawful relation between them and the master. The statute of 1793, ch. 52, sec. 1, enacts that such ships or vessels as are enrolled and licensed according to the provisions of that act, "and one others, shall be deemed ships or vessels of the United States, entitled to the privileges of ships engaged in the coasting trade or fisheries;" and the whale fisheries are expressly within the purview of the act, as is abundantly seen in the form of the license prescribed by the fourth section. Now, it seems plain to me that no registered ship is entitled to carry on the usual fisheries, as an American ship, or as being entitled to the privileges of an American ship, under the statute of 1793, ch. 52. The third section declares that it shall be lawful for the collectors of the several districts to enroll and license any ship or vessel which may be registered, upon such registry being given up, or to register any ship or vessel that may be enrolled, upon such enrollment and license being given up; and the sixth section treats every ship and vessel not so enrolled and licensed, and found engaged in the trade, as liable to pay the same fees and tonnage in every port of the United States as ships or vessels not belonging to a citizen or citizens of the United States; and, under certain circumstances, the ship or vessel, and its lading, becomes liable to forfeiture. My opinion, therefore, is, that this ship cannot be deemed an American ship within the sense of the third section of the act of 1835, ch. 40, in which this indictment is founded, and the crew are not the crew of such an American ship or vessel as is contemplated by the act. On this ground the indictment would fail upon the facts.

Indeed my impression is, that upon the manifest intent of the act of 1793, ch. 40, no registered ship or vessel can, while she remains registered, engage in the whale fisheries; but she must surrender her register, and be enrolled and licensed for the fisheries; and that if she should be found engaged in such fisheries without such enrollment or license, at least if she has on board any article of foreign growth or manufacture, or distilled spirits, other than her stores, she would be forfeited. The main purpose of the act would be utterly frustrated upon any other construction, and the main securities and privileges of the trade be defeated.

The district judge concurred in opinion that the facts did not support the indictment, and thereupon the district attorney entered a nolle prosequi.

COPY.

Treasury department, June 29, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: As several days will probably elapse before a reply can be received from the president on the subject of your memorial, I hasten to suggest for your consideration one circumstance connected with your relief, which does not appear to be fully understood by those you represent. The circulars which have been issued by the comptroller in consequence of the late decision of Judge Story as to vessels employed in the whale fisheries, and his applications to him by several collectors for instructions on the subject, advert to the power possessed by the secretary of the treasury to remit forfeitures and penalties in all proper cases. But the comptroller did not go into details on the extent of that power in any special case, that not being considered as properly belonging to his bureau.

I am happy to inform you, however, that should an application come before me for the remission of those forfeitures and penalties, and should it include among them specifically the foreign duties paid on both the vessel and cargo, I entertain little doubt but they all can be released. The only equitable condition, which now occurs to me as suitable to be attached to the remission, is, that a sum equal to the hospital money should be deducted, if that money has not before been paid.

This would leave those interested in the same state, as to pecuniary payments to the government, in which they would have stood, had the decision by Judge Story not have been made, nor the circulars enforcing it have issued.

At the same time it will sustain the construction of the acts of congress given by the courts of law, and which, on a careful examination of the records of this department, appears in numerous cases and without exception to have been countenanced by instructions given by former comptrollers during many years immediately subsequent to the passage of those acts. The change in practice afterwards appears to have grown up in silence and from convenience.

For your further information as to the mode of procuring immediately the full relief before proposed, where parties do not prefer waiting for the action of congress, or the decision of the president whether any thing more favorable can properly be done in your behalf, I would observe that the application must be made to the secretary of the treasury in the manner prescribed by the act of the 2d of March, 1797, and should request all the powers for remitting forfeitures, penalties and duties to be exercised which is conferred both by that act and the 4th section of the act of the 2d of March, 1803. With great respect, your obedient servant.

Signed, LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the treasury.

THE AMERICAN CONSUL AT HAVANA.

From the Boston Atlas.

Last summer capt. Howell, commanding a Spanish vessel, outward bound, having arrived at Key West, was taken out of his station and the voyage broken up, by order of our American consul, N. P. Trist. Capt. Howell was obliged to return to his Spanish owners at Havana, and give the particulars of the outrageous proceedings of the consul. It became notorious, and reflected severely on the illegal conduct of Trist. One day, capt. Howell was publicly speaking of the matter, in the American Coffee House at Havana, when a young Frenchman, (nephew to Trist, and who is a spy upon the shipmasters and Americans there), heard the indignation of the Americans, at the base treatment capt. Howell had suffered from our consul. It went to Trist's ears, and capt. Howell was immediately seduced to the prison gates, and then incarcerated in a cell. He remained in his dungeon about six months, and was liberated last February. His owners (Catalans) commenced a suit against Trist for breaking up the voyage, stating their damages at $20,000;—and capt. Howell commenced a suit, for damages, &c. arising from unlawful imprisonment, for $10,000. Trist was obliged to give a statement of the case to our government at Washington, and he received the censure of Mr. Forsyth, with orders not to interfere with the regulations of Spanish maritime customs. But Trist had gone too far; he liberated capt. Howell, and hoped the matter would drop—but the suit continued; and by recent advices from Havana, we learn that the plaintiffs were successful.—The Spanish court declared that Trist had exceeded the bounds of his authority, and was liable for damages arising therefrom. Trist must sign the documents, and he will, I trust feel the odium that it must reflect upon him.

It now remains to be seen whether Trist has any funds to pay the damages. He has been unwell ever since the verdict was given—mortification at this signal defeat is the disease.

There are many instances in which Trist has abandoned his consulate interest in the welfare and protection of the Americans, and appeared against them, in the low and mean character of an enemy. There is something of so base a nature in the character of the man, that these acts are in complete harmony with his principles; and Americans who have resided some time in Havana, no longer wonder at the tricks of his villainy.

Last winter a young man came passenger in a brig to Havana, and the morning after his arrival appeared before the consul, stating that his trunk had been broken open, and he was robbed of $400. Trist sent the Spanish soldiers after the captain, and thrust him into prison. There was no evidence of any robbery, and the captain enjoyed the highest reputation among his fellow countrymen.

On questioning the passenger, suspicions were raised regarding him, and capt. P's innocence was manifest. The Americans raised a subscription and liberated the captain. The passenger applied to captain Babbitt, of the Boston, then at Havana, for passage to the states; and in his usually geography, he was about granting it, when his officers, getting a statement of the case, laid it before him, and capt. Babbitt turned him over to his "adviser," the consul.

The notorious case of insult, and abandonment of American protection to purser Southall, by Trist, subjects him to the severest censure of all the Americans at home and abroad.

Pursor Southall was on his way to the masquerade ball, on an evening in March last, and when near the theatre, he was charged upon by a dragon, and received a wound in his neck. He was without his arms, and had only a supplejack, or stick, for amusement. He looked upon his life as endangered by an assassin, and being without the means of defence, he nobly bared his heart to the horseman, and standing erect as a pillar, told him—"he was an American!—that he was unarmed, and if he was going to kill him, to aim at his heart—for I know," cried the pursor, "my country will avenge my death!" The horseman charged upon him again, and the pursor received a severe wound in the hand.

Many now thronged around, and the pursor was borne off his feet, by his friends to the theatre. The lieutenant of the island took his name and promised him satisfaction. In the morning captain Babbitt called upon the captain general, and demanded satisfaction. Various documents passed between them, and in two weeks the Boston sailed for Pensacola, having only the promise of indemnity.

The Boston returned to Havana in about five weeks or less, and the demand was renewed. A tribunal was held, and the pursor was summoned to give in his deposition. He demanded the presence of the American consul, and it was refused; he insisted upon it, and after great reluctance, they sent out for him—the policemen returned in two hours, saying they could not find him. The pursor stood to his rights, and refused giving in any statement without the presence of the consul; and so the court finding he must come, sent again for him.

In half an hour, Trist came in, and petulently cried, "Well, sir, and what do you want of me?"—"Your duty as a consul," answered the pursor.—"I can do nothing for you," said the consul—"you will get justice here if you want it," and then bolted out of the apartment. Comment on such conduct is unnecessary. The case has gone to Washington; and I ask has any thing been done?

AN AMERICAN.

FARMERS' WIT.

Editors have not much time for reading agricultural essays, and seldom trouble themselves thereanent, unless they happen to be fancy farmers, as citizens sometimes are. Turning over our exchange papers of yesterday, however, we found in the "New England Farmer" the reports made by the committees appointed to adjudge the merits of different objects at the last exhibition of the Worcester (Mass.) Agricultural society. The following, which happened to catch our eye in roving over the columns which contain these reports, being a little out of the regular order and style of these rural compositions, having rather amused us, may also be acceptable to our readers. [Nat. Intel.]

Committee on sheep. Joseph Mason, (Templeton), chairman. The committee appointed to award premiums on sheep respectfully submit the following report:

Like the shepherds of antiquity, your committee feel themselves honored in having charge of a flock of sheep. We have never felt any of that antipathy for this useful and inoffensive animal, which induced a distinguished southern gentleman to say that he would go a mile out of his way to kick a sheep. On the contrary, we have always entertained feelings of kindness towards this humble, though very warm friend of mankind. Nor do we feel any sheepishness in acknowledging our dependent relation to them as the receivers of their cast off garments to cover our nakedness and protect us from the cold.

In its wild or savage state, the sheep is said to be a bold, courageous and fleet animal, able to oppose and defend itself against other animals of its own size, or to escape by flight from those of superior strength. It is a problem that has not yet been solved, how the art of man should so change its nature and deprive it of its natural courage and boldness. As an explanation of this paradox, your committee will merely allude to the fact, that the ancient shepherds beguiled the hours, while tending their flocks, in performing on the harp or lyre some soft and simple strains of music; which fact affords a complete explanation, according to a principle laid down by the celebrated Montesquieu, that soft and plaintive music diminishes the ferocity and boldness of a people—unless, indeed, some good reason can be given why the same principle will not apply to sheep which that learned writer has applied to men.

It would be a matter of curious inquiry to ascertain whether, with this change which has taken place in the character of the sheep, there has been a corresponding change in its phrenological developments. This question we will refer to the phrenologists, and we hope that some of them will examine the subject, and report before the next cattle show. It is to be presumed that there will be found a great depression of the organ of destructiveness, and an unusual elevation of the organ of sheepishness.

A sheep should be judged of like a dandy, by the fineness of his coat. We beg pardon of the sheep for the comparison—but it is so apt! In both cases, the coat is the most important part of the animal. What is a sheep good for without a fleece, and what is a dandy good for without a coat?

Some of the sheep examined by your committee were of a superior quality. They were of different bloods of merino, dishley and Saxony, mixed with that of the native sheep. None, however, were presented with a golden fleece, like that which James obtained in the celebrated Argonautic expedition; and it is the opinion of your committee that that species of sheep is entirely extinct; at least, it is unknown in the county of Worcester. We think that if another should be discovered in these days, it would be kept to perpetuate the stock, instead of being sacrificed to either Jupiter or Mars; and that enough would be found to contend for the fleece, even though guarded by the bulls with brazen hoofs and horns, and the armed men and the sleepless dragon.

Your committee can express no opinion as to the best mixtures of blood for the wool grower to obtain. That must be determined by a variety of circumstances. In connexion with this subject, however, we will mention a very excellent suggestion of a good farmer's wife, somewhere in Vermont, who, having been put to some inconvenience to procure some cotton to mix with her wool for domestic manufacture, advised her husband to get a cotton ram, so that they might have cotton and wool ready mixed, from their own flock.

Your committee awarded to Thomas W. Ward the premium of seven dollars for the best merino ram. No other ram was presented, but by the rules of the society, could be considered as his competitor. Four Saxony bucks were presented by Rejoice Newton, esq. of Worcester; but as no premium is offered by the society for Saxony bucks, we can merely certify to all whom it may concern, that they had very fine wool and very large horns.

The best merino ewes were presented by Messrs. Francis Strong and Charles Hadwio, of Worcester; and your committee accordingly awarded to them the premium of eight dollars, which is offered by the society. The premium of four dollars for the next best merino ewes, was awarded to William Thompson, of Oakham. The wool of these ewes was of a very superior quality, and had some appearance of being a mixture of merino and Saxony.

The only mixed merino sheep presented for a premium were five ewes belonging to Thos. W. Ward, of Shrewsbury. They were a mixture of merino and Bakewell breeds, and, both on account of their size and the quality of the wool, entitled the owner, in the opinion of the committee, to the premium of five dollars, which was accordingly awarded to him.

The premium of five dollars for the best native ram was awarded to Hollon Maynard, of Northboro'. This ram is reputed to be two years old, and though he had rather a multon headed expression, was, on the whole, a very fine fellow, and did no discredit to the place of his nativity.

Marshall Pratt, of Oxford, presented a large and very fine looking ram, which your committee found causing sheep's gall at a beautiful dishley ewe in the same pen. The gall-fewer was a little disturbed by our plucking a lock of wool from his side, an examination of which satisfied the committee that, instead of being purely native, he had some mixed blood.

A native buck was presented by Daniel Tenney, esq. of Sutton, and also by Joshua Eveleth of Princeton, but, though good, they were unequal to that of Mr. Pratt.

Daniel Tenney, esq. of Sutton, presented four native ewes, and no others being presented, your committee had no hesitation in awarding to him the premium of four dollars.

There were two claimants for the premium for the best native wethers. Those presented by Cooledge Pratt, of Oxford, were very fine; but, after some debate, and a much grave consideration, the committee resolved to give the two native wethers of John Whitney, of Princeton, were the best, and therefore awarded to him the premium of three dollars.

Three rams of the dishley breed were presented for premium—two very clever ones, by Seth Blauchard, belonging to the society of Shakers, in Harvard; but the largest and best of the three, was the one presented by Edward Warren, of Northboro'. He had no horns, but his tail was as broad as a pillow, and would do admirably for the lambs to lay their heads on when they lay down to sleep; therefore, after due deliberation, the committee awarded to Edward Warren the premium for the best ram of the dishley breed.

Your committee did not award to any one the premium for the two best ewes of the dishley breed. Two sheep were presented for this premium by Jonathan P. Dana, of Oxford, but on examination, we were of opinion that they were a mixed breed, and had but little dishley blood in their veins.

Several other good sheep were presented for exhibition.

On the whole, the superior quality of the sheep presented for premiums and exhibition, shows the influence which our society has exerted in improving the breed of sheep, as well as the general interest among the farmers on this subject.

All which is respectfully submitted by your committee,

JOSEPH MASON, chairman.

MANUFACTURING.

As an illustration of the kind of labor, our manufacturers have to contend against, we copy the following article. What is said of the laborers of Saxony, is more or less true of those of the whole of Europe, indeed of the world generally.

The manufacturers of Saxony. The cotton manufacture of Saxony has already become of twice the extent that it had reached before the union; while the linen and woollen manufactures of that country have not experienced any increase. The reason for this difference is, that the persons engaged in the latter, which are more ancient branches of industry in Saxony, are so far "protected" that it is necessary to serve a regular apprenticeship, and to obtain admission into the guilds or corporations established in the manufacturing towns before any man is allowed to carry on the business; while the recent established cotton manufacture is without restriction or regulation of any kind, so that any person who can purchase or hire a loom is at liberty to become a cotton weaver.

The manufacturers are greatly encouraged by the miserably low wages in Saxony. It is stated on the best authority, that in October, 1837, a man employed on his loom, working very diligently from Monday morning till Saturday night, from five o'clock in the morning till nine in the evening, and with a lamp, his wife assisting him in finishing and taking him the work, could not possibly earn more than 20 groschen (2s. 6d. sterling) per week; and that another man who had three children aged 12 years and upwards, all working at the loom as well as himself, with his wife employed in doing up the work, could not earn in the whole more than one dollar, 40 groschen, (5s. 4d.) weekly.

The wretched manner in which the poor classes in that country subsist may be inferred from the facts exhibited by official statistical returns, that the annual consumption of meat, in the principal manufacturing districts, including the town of Zennitz, does not average more than 25 pounds for each individual of the population, and that at least one half of this quantity consists of pork. If this provision were equally divided amongst the entire number of inhabitants, it would amount to scarcely more than half a pound weekly for each individual; but, as the actual distribution is, of course, very different from this, it is very probable there are many among the laboring artisans who rarely, if ever, taste animal food. The quantity of cotton bosier made in Saxony has increased immensely of late, and from its cheapness has not only secured the monopoly of the markets afforded throughout the union, but has also been shipped largely to the United States to the exclusion, so far, of the goods made at Nottingham. It may be stated, on the respectable authority already quoted, that cotton gloves are furnished by the Saxon manufacturers as early as six groschen, or 9d. sterling per dozen. Stout cotton caps which are worn by the laboring and common people in that part of Germany, having stripes in six different colors upon black ground cost 12 groschen per dozen, or 15d. sterling each.

These low prices are not the results of the same cause which has gradually reduced the cost of production in this country. Hitherto the machinery used in Saxony has been of the commonest sort, so that the cheapness of the manufactured goods has been owing to the low rates of wages, a rate which compels the artisans to labor long and diligently, in order to ensure for their families the scantiest supply of the most common necessities of life. The capital of the English manufacturer, which empowered him to employ the most perfect machinery, joined to his greater experience, has hitherto enabled him to compete successfully in most branches of skilled labor, but these advantages cannot be long retained in competition with greatly reduced wages. The profits which the Saxon manufactures have thence enabled to realize will speedily lead to the introduction of improvements that will place our dearer processes at a still greater disadvantage, and as it is any thing but desirable that we should retain our present relative position through the increasing hardship of our operative weavers, there appears to be but one course open to us, in order to avert the evil—that of still further liberalizing our commercial system, and especially of lessening the cost of the prime necessities of life by abolishing all restrictions upon the important one of food.

The want of capital, which has hitherto been the chief obstacle to the still greater extension of the cotton manufacture in Saxony would, in time be remedied by the successful operation of the existing establishments; but the manufacturers in that country, unwilling to wait for so gradual a development of their resources, have had recourse to the expedient of establishing joint stock companies.—The total capital of associations of this character that have been recently formed, and which are now proceeding to the accomplishment of their various objects amounted in October, 1837, to nearly $13,000,000, (about £2,000,000 sterling)—a large sum for that country, and the greater part of which is furnished by the bankers and other capitalists of Leipsic. ISLAND OF CANDIA.

We take great pleasure in presenting to our readers the following most interesting sketch, from the pen of a distinguished fellow citizen, now minister at the court of France, the honorable Lewis Cass.

It was on the 29th July, 1837, that emerging from the beautiful group of the Cyclades, we approached the ancient kingdom of Miuos. We had run down from Constantinople with a favorite breeze and delightful weather, and had passed the various isles and islets which "crown" this glorious "deep," and which have been theatres of events that will forever render them celebrated in the annals of mankind. All of them are small specks, hardly distinguishable upon the map of the world, and some of them are mere rocks; but there is a deathless interest attached to them, which time cannot annihilate, and which will survive all the revolutions of society or political changes they are destined to undergo. The sentiment is a generous tribute to the dignity of human nature. It is not wealth, or power, nor numbers, which impose upon the imagination. It is none of these, nor the memory of these, which bring the transatlantic pilgrim, from the bustle and business and enterprise of a new world, to contemplate these scenes of former civilization and of present decay. No! he renders his homage to a nobler idol!—to the memory, genius, industry, advancement in civilization, progress in the arts and sciences, and the cultivation of whatever can best promote the interests of human nature.

We had passed by Lemnos, Teuedos, Milylene, the ancient Lesbos, Scio, Delos, Syra or Syros, Paros and the various other islands, which deck these seas, and whose names and history are familiar to the reader; and we had stopped at several of them to examine their condition and to run over their interesting remains: The compression, if we may so speak, of sciences and events within a narrow compass; and the powerful emotions which this short voyage is calculated to execute, may be appreciated by this striking fact, that at one point of our passage, we had in view at the same moment, Syra, Tinos, Andros, Delos, Mycone, Naxos, Paros, Antiparos, Siphanto and Serpho. We had passed in the distance of the island of Patmos, the residence of St. John, and, if not the scene of the revelations made to him, the place where he wrote the Apocalypse which recorded them.

Our own internal seas present masses of water large and some of them larger, than this "Egean deep," and abound with picturesque objects almost unrivalled in the world. The entrance into Lake Superior, with the shores embosomed in woods, the high lands gradually opening and receding on each side, and the water as clear as crystal, extending beyond the reach of the eye, forms one of the most striking displays of natural beauties it has ever fallen to our lot to witness. And a scene almost equally impressive, though of a different character, attends the traveller who crosses the small arm of Lake Huron between the island of Michilimackinac and the entrance of the strait of St. Marie, which communicate with Lake Superior. One bright summer morning we found ourselves making this passage, and as the sun displayed his disk above the water which surrounded us, we were surprised by a singular interesting spectacle. We were accompanied by a fleet of three hundred Indian canoes, which had left Michilimackinac in the night, in order to make the passage, before the wind—which strengthens as the day advances—should render the voyage dangerous, for the frail birch vessels in which they navigate the rivers and lakes and furnish them with so much of their subsistence. These Indians had made their usual annual visit to Michilimackinac, to sell their peltries and procure supplies of ammunition and clothing, and to talk over their public affairs with the representative of the government stationed there, at that time Mr. Schoolcraft, to whose worth as a citizen, and to whose exemplary conduct as a public officer, we are happy to have this opportunity of bearing testimony. They were returning in high spirits, having with them all their families, as it is the usual custom of the Indians in these excursions, and having also a supply of the articles most necessary to enable them to contend with the hardships incident to their mode of life. The lake was perfectly smooth, the Indians animated paddling with their utmost energy and singing their various songs, with a strength of lungs which sent these far over the water. The whole display was full of life, and we recollect it with the most pleasant emotions. But these scenes upon our Indian border, whether still or animated, are feeble in their effects upon the human mind, when compared with the impressions produced in the theatre where we were now moving. Distance, however, no where lends enchantment to the view more than here. But the nakedness of reality comes primarily to destroy all these delusions on a near approach. All these islands are destitute of timber, naked as a vast prairie, but without one other point of resemblance. They are generally rocky, broken by ravines, and to the eye nothing can appear more sterile. The mode of culture, when they are cultivated, is slovenly, the inhabitants indolent, the houses mean and dirty, and towns and villages in a state of decay, and yet we visit them with the deepest interest. We visit them for what they have been, and in spite of what they are.

One of the most renowned is the little islet of Delos, or rather the two morsels of rock and earth known under that name, but separated by a narrow channel, furnishes the most striking illustration of these remarks and the most complete picture of desolation, which even these regions exhibit. In our lonely walk amid its ruins, we did not meet a single human being. What a contrast between this almost frightful solitude and its former condition, when it was filled up by busy crowds which inhabited it, or which continually flocked to it to worship at its temples, as the Jews went up to Jerusalem to render their devotions to the living God!

The sanctity of this chosen spot, is one of the facts best known in the history of ancient manners. It was the birth place of Apollo and Diana, and it is there, their famous temples were dedicated respectively to the brother and sisters and to their mother Latona. Their ruins yet attest the extent and splendor of these edifices; to the constructions and establishment of which the various states of Greece contributed with a generous spirit of rivalry, evincing the liberality of their disposition and the ardor of their religious faith. The island was holy ground, a place of refuge, where even enemies were friends when they met upon it. I have related an interesting anecdote upon this subject. A commission of Roman deputies going to Syria and Egypt were compelled to stop at Delos, where they found a number of galleys belonging to the kings of Macedonia and Pergamos at anchor, although these two princes were then at war. The historian adds, that the Romans, Macedonians and Pergamians, met and conversed in the temple, as though they had been friends. The sanctity of the place suspended all hostilities.

In like manner, when the victorious Persian squadrons swept the Grecian seas, and landed their tents, which ravaged the other islands, the commander of the fleet, when he approached the inhabitants for having quitted it on his approach, adding, "why have you quitted your dwellings, and thus marked the bad opinion you have of me? I am not your enemy by choice—and besides I am ordered by my king not to commit hostilities in a country where two divinities were born, and to use no violence towards those who inhabit it.—Return then, and resume possession of your houses and lands!"

And in this island, thus venerated, we saw, not the marbles actually in the process of being burnt into lime, but the pits where the lime had been made, and where, perhaps, some of the most beautiful works of antiquity had been prepared to form the mortar for a miserable cottage. It is said, that heretofore the inhabitants of Mysoene rented this island from the Turkish government at the annual price of ten crowns! Such a picture admits no other trait.

As the last island of the Ægean group sunk in the horizon, Crete rose before us, extending east and west and presenting its diversified shores to our view. The aspect was rugged, and the coast precipitous and iron bound, while in the interior arose a range of mountains upon whose summits the clouds were resting. We steered for the bay of Suda, and entered it without accident, mooring our noble frigate in its quiet waters.

This bay is one of the most magnificent ports in the world, stretching inland about six miles, with a breadth of three, capacious enough to contain the most powerful navy, and with sufficient depth of water for any vessel that floats. Its entrance is narrow, and divided by two small islands, on one of which is a little fortress, completely commanding the approach. We were told that the commanding officer was a bo-viviant, who loved wine better than the Koran; and that the captain of one of our armed vessels, who was desirous of entering the harbor, but who was prevented by the new quarantine regulations, which Mehemet Ali has recently adopted, found his way to the Egyptian's heart through a bottle of champagne, who, disregarding the fear of the plague and the fear of the pasha, dispensed with sanitary precautions and admitted his new friend to pratique without hesitation. Whatever opinion may be formed respecting the general conduct of the Turks in the manners of the western Europeans in other respects, there is none in this, that the higher classes are fast acquiring the habit of drinking wine, and some of them a much stronger liquid. The penchant of the late sultan for this indulgence, was well known through the empire, and could not fail to produce by its example a powerful influence. Ibrahim pasha is a confirmed toper; and if we should use a harsher word, we would probably convey to our readers a still juster idea of the extent to which he carries this habit. In Damascus, we found the table of the governor general of Syria loaded with wine; and his confidential friend and physician, a French gentleman, observed, significantly and jocosely, that his patron had fifteen thousand books in his library. We did not need the arch look, which accompanied these words to enable us to correct the errata; for books read bottles of wine.

Still this practice is neither altogether general nor public and we found that much prejudice was excited against those who indulged themselves too freely and openly. A respectable French officer, high in the confidence of the pasha, has renounced Christianity and embraced the Moslem faith. We found him in command of the ancient city of Sidon, and he is at this moment the second officer in the army of Ibrahim pasha, which is defending the entrance of Syria against the Turks. His new religion must sit lightly upon him, and the devout Mussulmen do not appear to have much confidence in the faith of their proselyte. What sort of a follower of the prophet can he be? said they; he never goes to the mosque; he drinks wine and eats pork. The days of Turkish fanaticism are indeed past. The time has been and not long since, when his turban would not have protected his neck from the scimitar or the bowstring.

The entrance of the bay of Suda, is from the east and beyond is a high projecting point, which completely shelters it from the sea. To the north and the south are rugged hills, but to the west the break between the ridges continues and forms a level valley, which opens in about two miles at the city of Canea. There are two small villages upon the bay, occupying the declivity of the southern range of hills. The scenery is not uninteresting, relieved by little orchards of olive trees, that precious gift of Providence, whose production is so essential to the inhabitants of the east. The plain leading to Canea is covered with a light sandy soil, and abounds in water, which might be used for the purpose of irrigating the crops, but which is most wholly neglected. There are some villages upon the route, and traces of a considerable population.

Canea occupies the site of the ancient Cydonia, the mother city of the island, renowned for its power and opulence, and which was the theatre of many interesting events in the history of Crete. But the modern town extends over a small part only of the ancient one.

It is not the political capital of the island, but it is the place of the greatest commerce—and this pre-eminence it owes to its position in the most fertile region of its port, where vessels of three hundred tons can enter, and to its vicinity, being within two miles of the bay of Suda, which affords safe anchorage to the largest ships.

It was formerly strongly fortified by the Venitians, but a portion of the works have been demolished, and another portion is in a state of dilapidation. This neglect is of the less importance, as it is probable the future possession of the island will depend more upon the decision of diplomacy than upon military expeditions.

The harbor is small and obstructed by ruins, and not safe in a northern gale. The buildings are old and in a state of decay, and every thing shows that the hand of oppression has weighed heavily upon the wretched population.

Mehemet Ali has established a rigid police throughout this dominions. Whoever possesses sufficient knight errantry to seek dangers, either for the sake of recording them, or from any higher motive, will find some time if he stopped in either of the provinces subjected to the sway of the Egyptian pasha. He chooses to be, through himself or his agents, the only oppressor in his government; a part, indeed, which he fulfills with admirable ability. But the traveller is safe, not only in his person, but he is generally protected from imposition and extortion. In traversing the island of Crete, he would have nothing to fear but the usual casualties of a journey and the fatigues to which he would be exposed by the state of the country and the manners of the inhabitants.

From the bay of Suda we sailed down the coast, passing Retimo, the third city in importance, after Candia and Canea, in the island. It was a place of great distinction in the time of the Venitians, and it is filled with the evidences of their power and wealth in every state of decay. It stands upon a low cape, but its harbor is not well sheltered, and the mole which formed it has been almost destroyed. The channel has been so filled up with an accumulation of sand, that no vessel drawing more than thirty tons can enter. Those of larger tonnage must remain in an open roadstead.

The population is about eight thousand, and its commerce is principally carried on with Greece and the islands of the Archipelago.

When we arrive at Candia, the capital of the island we unfortunately found Mehemet Ali there, with a part of his fleet, anchored before the town. We say unfortunately, because he had just given, in his own person, an example of submission to his quarantine regulations, which left us no hope of a relaxation in our favor, as we had visited a suspected port within the limited period. Not having, at our disposition, the time necessary to procure admission, we abandoned the island and bore up for the holy land.

The city of Candia presents rather an imposing aspect from the sea. In its rear is a range of mountains which extend through the island, and from amid which the snow covered top of Ida is prominently distinguishable from the rest of the chain. In the distance, the city is thrown with beautiful effect against this ridge, though in fact it is surrounded by a considerable plain. The mountains, however, diminish much in height and the chain is almost interrupted, so that the gaps furnish convenient routes for traversing the island from north to south. The plain extends to the base of the ridge from which Ida projects.

The city contains about twelve or fourteen thousand inhabitants. It has a mole, and a small port for vessels of light burthen; but for those of greater depth of water, it affords no protection but an open roadstead. It presents the aspect of an old Venetian town, rather than that of a Turkish one. The streets are wide and paved, but in a rough manner. There are some fountains, and occasionally rows of trees, which produce an agreeable effect. The fortifications are nearly in the state the Venitians left them, somewhat repaired, in the most necessary places, but generally dilapidated. The guns are old and apparently unserviceable, almost as dangerous to the possessors as to their enemies. The bazars are tolerably well supplied, and on the whole there is an agreeable air of business and neatness in the city, presenting a favorable contrast to the general aspect of the Turkish towns.

The island of Candia extends about one hundred and sixty miles from east to west, and about thirty from north to south in its widest part. It is divided by a ridge of mountains, running longitudinally through the island, and separating the northern from the southern part. Towards the centre, this ridge is less elevated and precipitous, and communications from one coast to the other have been easily established; but elsewhere the passage is more difficult, and the aspect of the interior more savage. The roads or rather passes, have been wholly neglected, and now tedious and dangerous. Wheel carriages are unknown, and the transportation of the productions to the coast forms an important portion of their cost to the purchaser. Frequently the solid masonry of the old Venitian bridges has survived the roads they were intended to connect, and evince the former flourishing condition of the country. There are no rivers—the streams descending from the mountains not deserving that name—but springs and rivulets are abundant, and under happier auspices might be employed in irrigating the fields. But alas! the country presents almost one scene of desolation. It is well known that the olive is a tree of slow growth, requiring many years to reach maturity and to produce its fruit. The ruthless Turks have cut down a large portion of these trees, the work of centuries, and thus extended their vengeance to succeeding generations. We found the same result elsewhere in the east, wherever in fact man had arrayed himself against man. The first act of oppression is to cut down the olive trees around a village, and then the labor of destruction is almost complete, for the miserable hovels are not worth the trouble of demolition. The plain from Athens to the Piræus were heretofore a magnificent olive orchard, but now its superb trees have almost disappeared, leaving scattered individuals to attest its former magnificence. With a little bread and a few olives a Greek soldier performs his duties and cheerfully encounters the painful marches over the rugged paths through his country. And the Greek peasant is happy, if he can provide a scanty supply of this favorite food for his wife and children. We were told at Athens of a curious division of property by which, frequently, the ground belonged to one man, the tree to another, and the product to the third. We were also told what was the principal by which these respective rights were regulated and the rent of the owners secured. But we have no space for its development.

About twenty miles from the city of Candia, at the base of mount Ida, is the cavern so celebrated under the name of the Labyrinth. It is in the vicinity of the site of the ancient city of Gortyna, whose remains yet attest its former power and opulence. The credulity of the ancients and their predisposition to the marvelous, are in nothing more remarkable than in the fabulous, recitals concerning this "Big Cave," as it would be called in Kentucky, and the exaggeration of many modern travellers has been scarcely less marked, and is certainly much less excusable. That it was originally a natural cavern in a soft lime stone rock, there is no doubt. Many of the chambers and passages have been increased by the hand of man, and it is wonderful that this should have been done and this subterranean asylum occasionally resorted to by the inhabitants of the neighboring regions; but that in an enlightened age, doubts should have been elevated into mystery, and much learned charlatanism employed to develop a very plain subject with difficulties. When the proximity of the city of Gortyna is recollected, and the contests in which it was involved for ages, together with the general state of insecurity, which has often prevailed upon this island, what more natural than that the inhabitants should occasionally seek refuge for themselves and their property in this secluded cavern, so difficult to be discovered and so easy to be defended; or, that in a succession of ages, the natural fissures in the rock should have been enlarged, and the whole work rendered more capacious and more comfortable? We are persuaded that this is the natural solution of all the mystery attending this subject. As to the story of the Labyrinth, and the thousand fables connected with it, they do not merit a moment's serious consideration, except so far as they furnish materials for an interesting chapter in the history of human nature; evincing on the one hand the fertility of the imagination, and, on the other, the extent to which credulity may be carried, either in an implicit belief in a monstrous fable, or in a more chastened faith, seeking the materials in by-gone events, and gravely endeavoring to account for the violations, not only of probability, but of possibility, by combining some all-glorious mystery with traditional fables.

One cannot but be struck with the resemblance between this cavern, and those to be found in the limestone regions of Kentucky. The description of the former is absolutely applicable to the latter, leaving not the slightest doubt but that they owe their origin to the same common causes. If the traditions of the aboriginal inhabitants of Kentucky had been preserved, it may be that they would have furnished us a story quite as interesting as the adventures of Theseus and the destruction of the Minotaur. And if they had found a record as lasting and as beautiful as the Roman poet has bequeathed to posterity, we might not have envied the Cretan wonder the description of its

"Parietibus textum cæcis iter, ancipitemque Millevisibus habuisse delum"

In the time of the Greeks.

It is estimated that Crete contained twelve hundred thousand inhabitants. In the mutation of its fortunes, these have been successively reduced, so that under the government of the Venetians, they did not reach one million; but the diminution was frightfully accelerated by the Turkish yoke, which with its accustomed destructive power, had brought this number down to about two hundred and eighty thousand before the commencement of the Greek revolution; and at present it does not exceed one hundred and seventy thousand, of whom one hundred and thirty thousand are Greeks, and forty thousand Mahometans. The state of the population in former ages is sufficiently indicated by the accounts which are given of its hundred cities

"Cæstum urbes habitant magnas"— and the epithet even which Homer applies to it, "Creta Hecatonpolis," marks the progress it must have made at that early period in the elements of wealth and power. And though this number of one hundred may have been rather a round one than numerically exact, still no doubt can exist, but that there were a great number of important towns in this island towards the commencement of the authentic history. Pliny, after enumerating nearly twenty cities upon the coast and as many in the interior, all existing in this time adds, that the memory of sixty others was still preserved. The renown which the island enjoyed among the ancients, for its fertility and the mildness of its climate, is well born out by these evidences of its adaptation to the support of a dense population

The repulsive effects of Turkish conquest upon the countries subdued by the Mahometans, is one of the distinctive traits of their religious and social institutions. Among other nations there is a slow but gradual tendency towards amalgamation between the invaders and the invaded; and generally in a succession of ages, the peculiar characteristics of each are so softened, if not annihilated, that the original differences disappear and cease to produce any effect upon the new society.—Not so with the followers of Mahomet. Their fanaticism never slumbers, and their religious dogmas raise an impassable barrier between themselves and the inhabitants of the countries overrun by them. It is a cardinal principle, not only of their policy but of their faith, that all the people they subdue, have justly forfeited their lives; and it is a practical corollary, that whether these shall be spared or not is a simple question of expediency. The English law is not the only one which delights in fictions; the Turkish code contains at least one of these subtle contrivances, by which results are obtained not originally contemplated by the lawgiver. When the conqueror Ravah is freed from military execution, this exertion of Mussulman mercy is not a pardon but a relief. The penalty always hangs over them, and is ransomed from year to year by a tax, constituting a considerable item in the Turkish budget. Every person in the Turkish empire, not a Mahometan, pays this yearly contribution, under the pretence of its being due to the sultan for his clemency in permitting the infidel dog to live under the shadow of his throne during another year.

As to the intermarriage between the professors of Moslemism and Christianity, this mode of uniting the races is impossible, because every such union is punishable with death, and the most sedulous attention seems to have been exerted in other respects to preserve the same system of separation. The Turk adopts a peculiar costume, one, which till lately, has not changed, and which has probably been unvaried since the days of Abraham; and he prefers, if not all the costume of a part of it, which his conquered subjects shall wear. An article of justice the Christian's statement is valueless, and he has little to hope from a legal controversy with a fellow subject of the favored caste. The cardinal principle of the Turkish policy seems to have been, that a Mahometan is made to govern and a Christian to submit; and this principle has been carried out in all the various forms that complicated state of society presents. We say has been, because great changes have come over the Turkish institutions and greater yet seem to be in progress.

At this moment, in the island of Crete, the condition of the Mahometans, if not actually worse than that of the Greeks, promises less melioration. The former are generally all poor, with the exception of a few rich agrars. Before the revolution they were janizars, and were maintained by their privileges and by the taxes and extortion wrong from the latter. But now this redoubtable code is suppressed, and its remains, driven to their own sources, are barely able to procure the necessities of life. Their number is in a state of rapid declension; while the Greeks, relieved from some of the oppressions which weighed them down, and finding their industry better rewarded, and their acquisitions better protected, are gradually advancing in improvement. Our intelligent informant told us, that four years ago scarcely a house was standing or a field cultivated; but that now the signs of prosperous industry began to meet the eye of the traveller in different parts of the island.

The principal agricultural product of Crete is the olive. It gives the most profitable return; though, at present from the dearth of labor, it is estimated that more than one-fifth of the olive trees are neglected; laborers not being found to gather the fruit. Wheat is also a staple article, but unfortunately the province of Messara, heretofore most devoted to its culture, was one of the districts which suffered most from the revolution; and this circumstance with the general depression of agriculture, has led to such a diminution in the supply, that large quantities of this article have been imported for consumption. However, the culture begins to revive.

The same causes have operated to depress the production of another of the staple articles of Crete—that of wine. The soil and climate are favorable to the growth of the vine, and several species of grape have been cultivated, producing different kinds of wine much esteemed, and which were formerly in demand for exportation. But the supply is now restricted to the domestic consumption; though as agriculture and manufactures revive, there is little doubt but that this branch of industry will be again cultivated with success.

Crete produces the following articles for exportation:

Oil—Which is peculiarly adapted from its quality to the manufacture of soap, though the quantity varies greatly from year to year.

Silk—Of a superior quality, but in small quantities.

Raisins.

Honey—Highly esteemed through the east.

Cheestnuts—An important article of consumption in these regions. Those of Crete are in much demand through the Archipelago.

Cheese—Formerly Crete possessed large flocks of sheep, and there was manufactured from their milk a cheese, known under the name of sphakian, esteemed through the east. The troubles in the island led necessarily to the diminution of the flocks, but they are now increasing, and cheese is again becoming an article of exportation.

Whetstones—Said to be of excellent quality.

Carobs.

Vallonea.

Almonds.

Soap—The habits of the eastern nations lead to a great consumption of soap. Their ablutions are frequent; and preferring fingers to knives and forks, they find themselves obliged, after eating, to wash with soap and water. We have often admired the dexterity with which the servants manage this ceremony. The water is always poured from the vessel with a spout, resembling one of our coffee pots, upon the hands, which are held over a basin, and the operation is a very comfortable one, while the habit itself of personal neatness is conducive to health.

Crete possesses many manufactures of soap, and this article which is of an excellent quality, is exported to all the countries in the Levant. Olive oil is used in its manufacture. The silks of Crete go to Trieste; the raisins to Tunis, Malata and Trieste; the carobs to Malata, Genoa and Constantinople; the vallonea to Trieste; and the almonds to the Black Sea. The other articles of produce principally to Turkey.

Crete imports from the Adriatic Gulf boards and nails, now much wanted for the construction and repair to houses—from Germany and England, cloths, cottons, calicoes, &c. A few articles of American manufacture find their way there indirectly. Colonial products coffee, rum, sugar, &c. are supplied by Trieste, Marseilles and Malta; leather by Leghorn and Russia; iron by Trieste; corn, when necessary, by the Black Sea, Macedonia and Anatolia; rice by Alexandria and Piedmont; butter by Africa; and codfish by France.

The commercial relations of Crete are principally with Syria and Trieste, which serve as entrepôts, whence the articles required are imported, from time to time, in small quantities.

The pre-existing commercial regulations through the Turkish empire must undergo great changes in consequence of the treaties recently negotiated by France and England at Constantinople. The principles will no doubt be extended to all other nations, faithfully executed, the odious monopoly established by Mehmet Ali in Egypt will be abolished, and that unfortunate country delivered from one of the heaviest oppressions under which it labors. But the pasha is shrewd, avaricious and unprincipled; and he may find the means to render abortive all the efforts of the commercial interest of western Europe to open its natural channels to the trade of Egypt. This system of monopoly, the last and worst contrivance of vice regal cupidity, has not found its way into Crete. The Egyptian merchant—for the pasha is the only free merchant in his metropolitan country—has yet spared his conquered provinces this infliction. He may be waiting the firmer consolidation of his power and the final settlement of the questions pending between him and his nominal sovereign, but actually rival, the sultan. His recent victory near Aleppo, and the death of his personal enemy Mahound, and the consequent stirring events which are now before him, are writing are going on in the east, seem to insure to him the great object of his ambition—the establishment of an independent and hereditary government in his family.

The import and export trade of Crete is fettered with few impositions, and many other countries might draw a profitable lesson in political economy from Turkish and Egyptian moderation. The gnosé is allowed to lay its golden egg daily, without the fear of death to extract from it the precious deposit, and thus in the fallacious hope of immediate acquisition, to sacrifice both present and future. The duties of entrance and clearance are three per cent. without any addition for coastage transportation. There is neither tonnage nor wharfe nor light house duty, and the pilotage is in fact whatever the vessels please to pay, for the regular allowance is but three piastres, say fifteen cents. As to manifests, and all the machinery of custom house security against frauds, the Cretan regulations make short work of them. The captain or merchant interested in the importation or exportation, makes his declaration at the custom house, and the affair is finished.

The Mahometan governments meddle but little with foreigners living within their dominions. As long as these refrain from any acts compromising the public peace, they are left to the jurisdiction of their own consuls. This jurisdiction is aided, if necessary by the local police, and the consuls are vested with very extensive and summary powers over their fellow countrymen—if a foreigner commits an offence against the peace of the island, he is delivered to his proper consul, who tries and punishes him agreeable to the laws of his own country. Formerly, whenever an injury was committed by a foreigner, a tax or awacik was levied upon the whole body of foreigners, and a fund thus raised, by which the innocent paid for the crimes of the guilty.—But all this is changed, and not only has the tax disappeared, but the offender is referred, as we have seen, to the jurisdiction of his own consul. The subjects of the new kingdom of Greece are yet liable to some vexatious restrictions, the result of the feeling inspired by recent events, and perhaps by the relations of language, religion and manners, which connect them with the great body of the Cretan people. But these precautions will gradually disappear, and the Greeks will be admitted fully to participate in the freedom enjoyed by other foreigners; which in fact, amounts almost to immunity.

When the allied powers of Europe interfered efficaciously for the establishment of the kingdom of Greece; considerations of policy prevented the annexation of Candia to the new state; to which union it was called by the wishes of its inhabitants, whose language, associations and interests connected them with their brethren of the same stock, and the dependants and remains of the subjugated eastern empire. However the island was not restored to the Turks, but was secured to Mahomet Ali, in whose possession indeed it had been for some time. He was required to govern it without the imposition of new taxes, a condition which, if faithfully observed, would go far to defeat one of the principal objects of Mahometan government, which is to levy from a wretched population all the money that power can procure and poverty furnish. In the present constitution of the island, it is governed by a pasha, whose authority is in fact unlimited, but whom the policy of the vice roy has surrounded with some institutions having the appearance of a representative character. And though no usefully radical result, to any great extent, has yet been obtained, because the elements of administrative knowledge are sparsely scattered among the Turkish population, still the experiment is an interesting one, and it is to be hoped it will be continued, and by the foundation of a gradual melioration in the political institutions of the island. The whole country is divided into twenty cantons, each of which sends two members to their proper municipal council. There are three of these councils—one at Candia, one at Retino and one at Canea. One of the deputies from each canton is a Greek, and the other a Turk; though this regulation has not been invariably observed, in consequence it is said of the difficulty of finding competent persons. But there is a singular difference in the application of this charge of incompetence, one of our authorities referring it to the Greeks and the other to the Turks. These councils have a legislative as well as a judicial power.—They frame the laws and try and punish the breaches of them. *But the pain of death cannot be inflicted without the approbation of the governor.—In addition to these duties, they have important administrative powers, such as the enforcement of the regulations concerning the public health, the fixing of the price of provisions, the superintendance of the public works, &c. The deputies receive a trifling salary, and being rather nominated by the government than elected by the people, cannot be supposed to be very independent.

We cannot close this sketch without acknowledging our obligation to Mr. Bonna, the consul of the United States at Canea. His long residence in the island, together with his general information, gives great authenticity to his statements, and he seems as eager to communicate as the traveller is to collect. He enjoys a high reputation at Canea, and deservedly so, and is a most worthy representative of our country in that remote place. We know no subject in the legislation, connected without external relations, which demands more prompt and urgent attention than the situation of our consular establishments, more particularly those placed in Mahometan countries. Almost every where, indeed, the office of American consul is little better than an eleemosynary employment. Scattered over the globe, and stationed at all the increasing commercial points, these officers are dependant upon casual fees—altogether, except in a very few instances, inadequate to their support. On the continent of Europe, at some of the consulates, these fees are principally composed of charges upon the American traveller for the visa of his passport; that is, for the certificate of the consul, under his official seal, that he has examined the passport—an indispensable ceremony—without which the traveller would find his journey arrested by the police. But this tax is paid with much reluctance, and in fact ought to be abolished. But a substitute, however, should be immediately provided by law in an annual fixed allowance. And, what is still worse, many indispensable expenditures made by the consuls are left without being remunerated, because there is no legal provision for their allowance.

*There is a little American mission at Canea; at the head of which is Mr. Benton—a worthy man—devoting himself zealously to the task he has undertaken, principally the education of youth. He has met with some difficulties from the local authorities, but we understand, these are yielding to a better knowledge and a more correct appreciation of his motives and objects, and we could scarcely invoke for the island a more interesting institution than the firm establishment of this missionary undertaking.

No American can meet these little bands of pilgrims, which his country now sends forth to every benighted portion of the world, without a just notion of pride and patriotism as pure as it is profound. With a devotion to alone ardent and enlightened, these generous apostles of religion, morality and education, gird themselves up to their task, and abandoning their native land with all it offers, go forth to regions, marked by ignorance, intolerance and misery as their own. They go indeed under the star spangled banner, but is neither to gather riches nor to carry war. Higher and holier sentiments impel them to the journey, and support them in the trials they are called upon to encounter. It was our good fortune to visit several of these establishments in the east, and we found that their inmates had conciliated the respect of the native inhabitants and were laying the foundation of future usefulness. These green spots in the moral desert are indeed refreshing, and doubly so to an American, as tributes of the generous zeal of his country to these regions of early civilization. We sincerely hope they may continue to multiply and flourish, and that the fruitful streams from the western continent which give them nourishment, may not fail in their supplies.

REMINISCENCES OF BOSTON FROM 1784 TO 1795.

From the Cincinnati Evening Post.

Our first visit to Boston was in 1784. There was no bridge then, and at very high spring tides, the neck, by which the peninsula on which the town is built, is connected with the main land, was sometimes overflowed, making the town an island. The north end of the town was entered by a ferry from Charlestown. At this period very little improvement had been made in it since the revolution, and there was much talk about the possibility of building a bridge to Charlestown, many believing it impossible, from the great depth of water in the channel of Charles river; others insisted, that it would be greatly injurious to the navigation; but by far the greater number disbelieved in the possibility of building one. There was then living at Mystic (now Medford) about three miles from Boston, an ingenious shipwright by the name of Cox,* he insisted upon the practicability of building the bridge; was anxious to undertake it, and willing to stake his all upon the result. He succeeded in bringing the enterprising and influential to his views; a charter was obtained, and the bridge built, and was opened on the 17th of June, 1786, the anniversary of the battle of Bunker's Hill, when Boston poured forth her thousands in grand procession over it to celebrate the event. We have been thus particular upon this subject, because it was the building of this bridge that first gave an impetus to the improvement in Boston. It was the longest bridge in the world, and with the exception of the abutments built entirely of wood; it yielded a profit from $20 to 40 per annum, until West Boston bridge was built in 1793. This far surpassed in length, and beauty of architecture, the other, add to which, it was connected with a causeway on the Cambridge side, about the same length as the bridge—the two forming a beautiful promenade of about two miles in length, splendidly illuminated every evening with a profusion of lamps. A little incident occurred when the two ends of the bridge were being brought to a close in the middle, which we have good reason to remember. There were present the master builder and a number of persons interested in the undertaking, waiting for the connecting plank to be laid down, that they might first cross the bridge; it was just at the close of day; we with a number of others were looking on; the first connecting plank was laid, and before the workmen were aware of our intention, we had crossed; a hot pursuit commenced, with the intention of catching and punishing us for our temerity; but we were not to be caught, and we were amply punished in being compelled to walk round through Cambridge and Charlestown, and pass into Boston over Charlestown bridge, a distance of six or seven miles.

The prominent political men of Boston, at the period alluded to, were John Hancock, Samuel Adams, Robert Treat Parke, James Sullivan, Oliver Wendell, Charles Jarvis, Benjamin Austin and Benjamin Russell, editor of the Centinel, who backed by the Essex Junto, in his press swayed the political destinies of Massachusetts, and through her, New England, a great portion of the time for nearly half a century. Hancock, Adams, Sullivan, Jarvis and Austin, were of the republican party. The most conspicuous among her commercial men, who also had great political influence, were Thos. Russell, Joseph Barrel, David Sears, John Coffin Jones, John Codman, Frazier & Son, Nathaniel Fellows, Joseph Parsons, Frederick W. Gayer, Jonathan Harris, S. & S. Salisbury and Stephen Higginson, the latter a man of talent, and a distinguished political writer; he wrote "Læocæ," against the administration of Hancock, by which he became very obnoxious to the republican party. Mr. Higginson done business upon Long wharf, and passed down State street on his way to his counting house. The truck-

*The complete success of Mr. Cox, in the construction of this bridge, occasioned his being sent for to go to Ireland, to build one over the Boyne, at Londonderry. He took his Yankee workmen with him; built the bridge to the satisfaction of his employers, and opened it on the fourth of July, 1788, when a battle took place between his workmen and the Irish, which, but for the prompt interference of the magistracy, aided by the military, would have been a very bloody affair. He was afterwards applied to by the corporation of London to take down the monument, which was built to commemorate the great fire of 1666, and which was supposed to threaten destruction by a fall, as it leans a little, but they would not give him his price, and he declined the undertaking. We lost sight of him after this entirely.

There is a hiatus in the political history of New England, which, no man, that we know of, can fill up but the venerable ex-editor of the Boston Centinel, the hon. Benjamin Russell; it is the want of the history of the Essex Junto. The vast influence exercised by the few individuals composing the Junto, aided by Mr. Russell and his press, was not confined to New England even, but was felt through all the ramifications of the federal party, from Maine to Georgia. They were controlled by hands and heads unseen. If Mr. Russell could be induced to undertake such a task, a blank in our political history would be filled up, which never can be done without him.—We doubt if the history of parties affords a parallel to this, a party who once possessed themselves of the whole power of the country, under the administration of the elder Adams, yet never knew the springs by which they were moved.

men who stood in State street took great pains to teach a parrot (that was in a cage at the corner of Commercial row) to know "Laro" and to curse him, and so completely successful were they, that "pretty poll" no sooner saw Mr. Higginson approach; than she began to "hurra for Hancock; damn Laro," and continued to do so while he continued in sight.

The merchants carried on a very extensive commerce with Russia and Sweden; from the former of which they imported immense quantities of iron, hemp, canvass and sheetings; from the latter, iron only. There was also an extensive commerce with France, Spain and Portugal carried on through the ports of Bordeaux, Lisbon and Barcelona. The trade with Great Britain at the time here spoken of was very limited; there was but five or six houses engaged in importing her manufactures; at the head of them was Frost & Son. The trade with China commenced about this time, not in specie but in seal skins taken on the northwest coast of America, carried to Canton and exchanged for teas, silks and nankeens. This business for many years was immensely lucrative, and large fortunes were made by it. Instances occurred where vessels that took out nothing but their provisions and some trilling articles to trade with the natives, brought back return cargoes that paid nearly a hundred thousand dollars duties. The trade to France, Spain and Portugal, consisted principally in the export of fish, and the import of their wines, brandies and fruit, with some silks from the two former.

There were a few, and but a few elegant mansions in Boston at this time, and they were all built before the revolution. Among the first modern improvements was that of Jonathan Harris, near Fort Hill, which was said to have cost nearly two hundred thousand dollars; it was followed by numerous others, and elegance, which far surpassed that in expense and elegance, until Boston, the last time we saw it, in eighteen hundred and sixteen, could boast more splendid private dwellings than any city, (of four times its then population) we ever saw, even in Europe.

In 1792 there was but one four story building in Boston, and that was on Union street, not far from Wing's lane. In 1816 there was a number of ranges of four and five stories high. There was not if our memory serves, a solitary brick warehouse on any wharf in the town. Long wharf stretched out into the harbor, with its seventy-four frame stores that did not appear to have been painted since the revolution. Then there was Minot's T projecting from the back of Long wharf, Sears' wharf, and at the north end of Hancock's wharf, with others of minor importance.

In 1792 or '3, the first vessels of war, carrying the tri-color of the French republic, arrived at Boston. They were the Concorde, of 44 guns, capt. Van Dongan, and the Marsailles, of 20 guns, capt. Van Dongan.

Van Dongan was afterwards at the battle of the Nile, Ville de Paris, of 120 guns, at the blown up in the bay. Their arrival created a great excitement, and the opposite political parties for a while forgot their differences; to unite in doing honor to their country's allies.

French victories followed each other in such rapid succession on the continent, that the enthusiasm in their behalf became extreme, and the Bostonians determined to celebrate them in the most splendid manner. The celebration took place in mid-winter, when the cold was intense. An ox was roasted whole, in State street, and then placed upon a car drawn by thirteen pair of white horses, preceded and followed by music, with an immense multitude carrying banners of various descriptions, and all wearing the tri-colored cockade, paraded through the streets, marshaled by col. Waters.

They then returned to State street, and the hard frozen roast beef was cut up with axes and distributed among the multitude. In the evening, the state house, the French consul's office, and a few other buildings, were splendidly illuminated. The old state house made a most beautiful appearance. Our old friend Russet, of the Centinel, tuned his harp to the Marsailles hymn at this time, and after giving a broadside at John Bull one day, he wound up with the following distich:

"Tis the boast of Briton to bluster and threaten,
But hangs his tail like a puppy when handsomely beaten."

His harp was new strung in 1793, to a very different tune, and Britons and black cockades were all the fashion. But to proceed: the principal ship yard then was at the foot of Milk street, intersecting with Kilby street, and there Nathaniel Fellows had built a ship, which he called the Gennett, in compliment to the French ministers. She was launched, ready rigged, from the stocks. She proved unfortunate. He then built the Robespierre; that prince of bloodhounds being then at the height of his power. She was loaded and sent to Bordeaux, but did not arrive there until her namesake had rendered up his forfeited life upon the scaffold, when her figure head, which was the statue of the tyrant, was dealt with a la Jackson on the Constitution. But nothing could damp the ardor of Mr. Fellows in the cause of the new republic, he built another, and called her the "Ca Ira," it will go on.

Bulfinch's pasture, at West Boston, was a large, open space of ground in 1792, west of which, to the water, there extended a range of hills unoccupied by any building but the "pest house," a great part of it if not the whole, has since been built up with splendid mansions; while at the north end, particularly from the entrance of North square down to where the Constitution frigate was built, very little improvement had been made, in 1816. There were the same old fashioned frame houses, with the upper story projecting over the lower one, that had occupied the ground more than a century, and gave an appearance of antiquity equal to the oldest towns in Europe. Most of the old streets in Boston are, as Freneau says of ancient New York, "moored on the horns of a ram," crooked and narrow, giving the town a very odd appearance to those accustomed to modern New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore or Cincinnati. In 1790, her population was but seventeen or eighteen thousand, but then, as now, that, with the population of the towns around her, within a distance of a dozen miles, constituted the most densely populated district in the United States, of its size. At the time we speak of, with the exception of the old state house and the churches, her public buildings were few and ordinary. There were few manufacturers in those days, except those connected with ship building, which was carried on rather extensively. Hats also were made in quantities by Boardmen at the north end, and Balch on Cornhill. Very few other articles were made in larger quantities than were wanted for home consumption.

Literature and the fine arts had already "a local habitation and a name" among the Bostonians. Her clergy were remarkable for their talents, piety and devout and holy life, practising what they preached. Among the Presbyterians, were Belknap, the historian and biographer; Elliot, a man of science and literature; Thatcher, a splendid orator; and Clarke, the profound scholar and most amiable of men. Among the Episcopal clergy, were Parker, (afterwards bishop); Lathrop, and soon afterwards Gardner, son of the old Sachem from the east, (as his father was called); he was a man of great talent, but more of a politician than a religionist. He wrote a poem called the Zulu Cabotinaid, which was very severe upon the republican party and its leaders. We never saw it but once, and that was nearly forty-five years ago, but we recollect that, in alluding to Dr. Charles Jarvis, who was a most splendid orator, and file leader of the republican party, (with Benj. Austin), he had the following couplet:

"Behold the demagogue, from whose smooth tongue
"Deception flows, as rivulets glide along."

Of the Baptist church, there were Stillman and Baldwin, the former a man of vast power and eloquence, such as we never heard surpassed in the pulpit; he was, indeed, a most splendid orator. The next and last that we shall notice, were the Universalists; at the head of whom was the great founder of that sect in the United States, John Murray; he was a host; cool, deliberate and powerful. He had for an assistant a Mr. Richards, the best poet America ever produced; he wrote the "Visions of Glory," extracts from which were frequently published in Thomas & Andrews Massachusetts Magazine in 1789 and '90.

There was a small society of Methodists, and also of Roman Catholics; the latter occupied a small chapel on School street, and were under the spiritual direction of the rev. Mr. Thayer.

The bench and bar were powerful in those days, on the former were Dana, himself a host; Paine, Sumner, afterwards governor, and Sewell. At the bar was the "giant Parsons," not from his size, reader, although he was a large man, but from his mighty mind; there were G. R. Minot, "the American Sallust," who wrote the history of "Slavery's Rebellion;" Samuel Dexter, one of the most profound reasoners that ever stood up in a court of justice; Fisher Ames, whose speech in congress, upon Jay's treaty, was never equalled, except by Sheridan on the trial of Warren Hastings; Rufus Gray Emory; Harrison G. Otis, who was both a graceful and eloquent speaker; and occasionally, Laban Wheaton, of Norton, who, to the ugliest of faces, joined a great mind and a good heart; with numbers of others, of more or less distinction. Of the medical profession those most conspicuous were Warren, Dexter, Lloyd, Rand, Danforth, and from '95, Thomas; the two former, professors in the Cambridge university. We could relate a number of anecdotes of Danforth, but will give you only one. In the revolution he leaned to the British side, and the "regulators" consulted together about dressing the doctor in a suit of home spun, vulgarly called tar and feathers; but it was overruled, and the doctor who was a man of great skill in his profession, was suffered to enjoy his political opinions unmolested. He was made acquainted with the facts, and knew to whose kinda intentions he came high being indebted for such a favor. Long after the war was over, this friend of his was taken very ill, and sent for him, he went and attended him with the utmost assiduity until he recovered. A few days after the doctor met him "on change," when he presented his hand to him; the doctor spurned him, saying, "do you think, you scoundrel, because I attended you professionally, that I will suffer you to offer me any familiarity?" and turned upon his heel and left him. He would not suffer any of his patients to trifle with him, not even a lady. When sent for he attended promptly, prescribed as the case required, and that prescription must be strictly followed, or not send for him again.

Boston had few literary publications in those days of which we speak. There were Edes's Boston Gazette, the oldest paper in New England, once or twice a week, we cannot say which. The Independent Chronicle, by Adams & Nurse, Mondays and Thursdays; and the Centinel, by Bennett, on Tuesdays and Fridays, and Saturday. The Massachusetts Magazine, monthly, was commenced in 1789, by Thomas & Andrews, and sustained a good reputation—in '93 and '94, Belknap & Young tried "The American Apollo," but it did not succeed; in 1793 or '4, Young & Mins established the Palladium, on Tuesdays and Fridays, and soon after John Russell, brother of Benjamin, established the Boston Gazette, on Mondays and Thursdays; about this time Paine got up the Federal Orery, but we think it did not last long. Mrs. Murray and Mrs. Weston shone in the periodical literature of the day at this latter period, and Paine, then Thomas, afterwards Robert Treat, was without a rival in furnishing odes and songs for all occasions.

Free schools were established in Boston about the year, 1620, and became the fountain, in after years, which furnished the streams of education to every hamlet in New England. Besides a number of English, there was a Latin free school, where youths were fitted for the university; we well remember master Hunt; without having the same good reason that hundreds of others had.

After the massacre of the 5th of March, 1775, the Bostonians turned their attention to the organization of volunteer companies, and in 1792 there were the governor's life guard, (horsemen) the independent cadets, under col. Bradford, in their splendid white uniforms with red facings; the independent fusiliers, under capt. Laughton; and in rich scarlet uniform, captain Wallach's Prussian blues; but the pride of Boston, in the military way, was "the ancient and honorable artillery." We will remember that upon their colors and drums were conspicuously displayed "incorporated 1638." The first Monday in this month (June), was their two hundred anniversary. The corps form a military school, being kept in perfect discipline, and the officers at each returning anniversary having to return to the ranks, and give place to other elected in their stead. The anniversary election of this company used to be the favorite holiday. The scene was a very imposing one on parade, when the officers elect marched out of the ranks in front of the line, and were received by those whose term had expired, who exchanged with them their badges of office, and receiving from them their muskets, and returned into the ranks from which a year before, they had been in like manner drawn.

In 1792 a company of comedians arrived from London, under the management of Mr. Powell, (a former company we have not seen since), and commenced a series of theatrical performances, which was fitted up for the purpose, and to evade the statute against theatrical performances they called the plays "moral lectures," but Hancock was governor, and was not disposed to suffer such base-faceted evasions of the law. They were playing the "moral lecture of Richard the Third," one evening, and proceeded as far as "Bosworth field" when the sheriff came unceremoniously upon the stage, and made prisoner of the humpbacked tyrant. Great uproar followed, and the portrait of Hancock that hung in front of the stage box was taken down and trodden under foot. The next night every man went armed with a bludgeon, but there was no more interference, and the next season a splendid theatre was built, a large majority of the town being in favor of it.

We had not the most distant idea of extending this article to half its present length when we commenced it; but the subject grew upon us. One remark more we are doing; there may be, but probably are some slight errors in the dates, although we are not aware of any.

REVOLUTIONARY PAPERS.

The National Intelligencer publishes the following documents, which are interesting as exhibiting the temper of the times, and the incipient steps taken by the colonists of New York to resist the encroachments of the mother country, on their rights and liberties. They were furnished to the Intelligencer by Peter Force, esq. from his collection of revolutionary and ante-revolutionary documents:

Committee chamber, New York,

Wednesday, April 26, 1775.

Present: Isaac Law, (chairman), Philip Livingston, James Duane, John Alsop, John Jay, Peter V. B. Livingston, David Johnston, Alexander McDougall, William Walton, John Broome, Joseph Hall, Abraham Walton, Henry Remsen, Peter T. Abraham Duryee, Joseph Bull, Abraham P. Lott, Abraham Duryee, Joseph Bull, Francis Lewis, Juno. Lasher, Joseph Totten, Thomas Ivers, Hercules Mulligan, John Anthony, Francis Bassett, Victor Bicker, John White, Theophilus Anthon, William Goforth, William Denning, Isaac Roosevelt, Jacob Van Voorhies, Jeremiah Platt, Robert Benson, John Seren, Nicholas Roosevelt, Edward Fleming, John De Lancey, Frederick Jay, William W. Ludlow, George Janeway, Rudolphus Ritzema, Lancaster Burling.

The committee having taken into consideration the commotions occasioned by the sanguinary measures pursued by the British ministry, and that the owners with which this committee is invested respect only the association, [of the continental congress], are unanimously of opinion, that a new committee be elected by the freeholders and freemen of this city and county, for the present unhappy exigency of affairs, and for observing the conduct of all persons touching the association; that the said committee consist of one hundred persons; that thirteen be a quorum, and that they dissolve themselves within a fortnight next after the end of the next session of the continental congress. And, that in case of the freemen and freeholders of this city and county may be better procured and ascertained, the committee are further unanimously of opinion that the polls be taken, on Friday morning next, at 9 o'clock, at the usual places of election in each ward, under the inspection of two vestry-men of each ward and two of this committee, or any two of them; and that, at the said elections, the votes of the freemen and freeholders be taken on the following questions, viz: Whether such new committee shall be constituted; and, if yes, of whom it shall consist?

And this committee is further unanimously of opinion, that, at the present alarming juncture, it is highly advisable that a provincial congress be immediately summoned; and that it be recommended to the freeholders and freemen of this city and county to choose, at the same time that they vote for a new committee aforesaid, twenty deputies to present them at the said congress; and that a letter be forthwith prepared and despatched to all the counties, requesting them to unite with us in forming a provincial congress, and to appoint their deputies without delay, to meet at New York on Monday, the 22d of May next. By order of the committee, ISAAC LAW, chairman.

[There was no election on Friday. Some of the reasons which tended to prevent an election are now in the following address, which was adopted by the committee on that day:]

the freeholders and freemen of the city and county of New York.

We regret, gentlemen, the necessity we are under of addressing you upon this occasion, and of perceiving with anxiety the disorder and confusion of which the city has been unfortunately involved from cool and temperate councils only good consequences may be expected; nor can union (so essential to the success of our cause) be preserved, unless every member of society will consent to be governed by the sense of the majority, and join in voting that sense fairly and candidly ascertained. Conscious that the powers you conferred upon us are not adequate to the present exigency of affairs, we were unanimously of opinion that another committee should be appointed; and, well knowing that questions of the highest moment and the last importance would come under their consideration, we called for their determination, we thought it most advisable that it should consist of a large number, in order that, by enlisting many of weight and consequence in all public measures, they might meet with the more advocates, receive less opposition, and be attended with more certain results.

The names of one hundred persons were mentioned by this committee; you were left at liberty to approve or reject them, and appoint others in their stead; and, that your sense might be the better taken, polls in each ward were directed to be opened. What could be more fair?

By all means, gentlemen, let us avoid divisions, and, instead of cherishing a spirit of animosity against one another, let us join in forwarding a reconciliation of all parties, and thereby strengthen the general cause.

Many, no doubt, have become objects of distrust and suspicion, and perhaps not without reason.—You have now an opportunity of trying them. It surely never can be good policy to put it out of their power to join us heartily. It is time enough to reject them when they refuse us their aid. In short, gentlemen, consider that our contest is for liberty, and therefore we should be extremely cautious how we permit our struggles to hurry us into acts of violence and extravagance inconsistent with freedom.

Permit us to entreat you to consider these matters seriously, and act with temper as well as firmness; and by all means join in the appointment of some committee to whom you may resort for counsel, and who may rescue you from tumult, anarchy and confusion.

We take the liberty, therefore, of recommending it to you, to go to the usual places of election in each of your wards, on Monday next, at 9 o'clock in the morning, and then and there give your votes for a committee of one hundred, to consist of such persons as you may consider the most worthy of confidence, and most capable of the arduous task.

Being also fully persuaded of the necessity of a provincial convention being summoned with all possible expedition, we recommend it to you, at the same time, to choose twenty deputies to represent this city and county in such convention, to meet here on the 22d day of May next. By order of the committee, ISAAC LAW, chairman.

New York, Friday, April 28, 1775.

[A letter advising the inhabitants of the colony to choose delegates to a provincial congress was at the same time prepared and transmitted by order of the committee. The following is a copy of the letter:]

Circular letter from the committee of the city and county of New York to the committees of the several counties in the colony.

Committee chamber, New York,

Friday, April 28, 1775.

GENTLEMEN: The distressed and alarming situation of our country, occasioned by the sanguinary measures adopted by the British ministry, (to enforce which the sword has been actually drawn against our brethren in the Massachusetts), threatening to involve this continent in all the horrors of a civil war, obliges us to call for the united aid and council of the colony at this dangerous crisis.

Most of the deputies who composed the late provincial congress, held in this city, (on the 20th, 21st and 22d of this month), were only vested with powers to choose delegates to represent the province at the next continental congress, and the convention having executed that trust dissolved themselves. It is therefore thought advisable by this committee that a provincial congress be immediately summoned to deliberate upon, and, from time to time, to direct, such measures as may be expedient for our common safety.

We persuade ourselves that no arguments can now be wanting to evince the necessity of a perfect union; and we know of no method in which the united sense of the people of the province can be collected but by the one proposed. We, therefore, entreat your county heartily to unite in the choice of proper persons to represent them at a provincial congress, to be held in this city on the 22d of May next. Twenty deputies are proposed for this city and in order to give the greater weight and influence to the councils of the congress, we could wish the number of deputies from the counties may be considerable.

We can assure you that the appointment of a provincial congress, approved of by the inhabitants of this city in general, is the most proper and salutary measure that can be adopted in the present melancholy state of this continent; and we shall be happy to find that our brethren in the different counties concur with us in opinion. By order of the committee, ISAAC LAW, chairman.

New York, Monday, May 1, 1775.

The following association was set on foot here last Saturday, (April 29th), and on that day it was signed by above one thousand of our principal inhabitants. It is to be transmitted to all the counties in the province, where, we make no doubt, it will be signed by all ranks of people:

"Persuaded that the salvation of the rights and liberties of America depends, under God, on the firm union of its inhabitants, in a vigorous prosecution of the measures necessary for its safety, and convinced of the necessity of preventing the anarchy and confusion which attend a dissolution of the powers of government: We, the freemen, freeholders, and inhabitants of the city and county of New York, being greatly alarmed at the avowed design of the ministry to raise a revenue in America, and shocked at the bloody scene now acting in the Massachusetts bay, do, in the most solemn manner, resolve never to become slaves; and do associate under all the ties of religion, honor and love to our country, to adopt, and endeavor to carry into execution, whatever measures may be recommended by the continental congress, or resolved upon by our provincial convention, for the purpose of preserving our constitution, and opposing the execution of the several arbitrary and oppressive acts of the British parliament, until a reconciliation between Great Britain and America, on constitutional principles, (which we most ardently desire), can be obtained; and that we will, in all things, follow the advice of our general committee, respecting the purposes aforesaid, the preservation of peace and good order, and the safety of individuals and private property.

Dated in New York, April and May, 1775.

New York, Monday, May 1, 1775.

In pursuance of a request of the committee of observation of the 26th of April, 1776, polls were opened in the several wards of this city for the election of one hundred persons as a general committee of association for the city and county of N. York, and of twenty-one deputies to serve in the provincial congress, with the deputies of the other counties, on the 22d of May instant; and by a return of the poll lists from the different wards, the following one hundred persons were chosen to form the said committee, and twenty-one of them as deputies for the provincial congress, viz:

bers attending, when Mr. Isaac Low was unanimously elected chairman, Mr. Henry Rensselaer deputy chairman, and Mr. John Biggs, secretary.

The first resolution adopted by the committee referred to the association.

Mr. Scott moved, seconded by Mr. McDougall, that a sub-committee of four members for each ward be appointed to offer the association, without delay, to the inhabitants of this city and county, and that they take down the names of such of them as shall not sign the association, and report their names to this committee.

"On the question, whether every person should not be waited on, except the lieutenant governor, (Colden), carried in the affirmative by a great majority."

[The deputies from several counties, elected to serve in the provincial congress, assembled at the exchange, in New York, on Monday, May 22d, the day named by the committee, but did not proceed to business until the next day, when the congress was organized.]

On Friday, May 26—Mr. Gilbert Livingston, (seconded by Mr. De Lancey) moved that a committee, consisting of a member from each county, be appointed to draw up and report a proper resolve of this congress, recommending to the different counties in this colony to form themselves into county committees, and also into sub-committees, for their respective townships and districts, and recommending the signing the general association, and also to prepare and report to this congress a draught of a letter to be sent to the committees and other persons in the several counties for the above purposes, with copies of such resolution; which was unanimously agreed to. And, Ordered, That Mr. De Lancey, of New York, Mr. Silvester, of Albany, colonel Harnesburg, of Ulster, Mr. Gilbert Livingston, of Dutchess, Mr. Allison, of Orange, Mr. John Williams, of Charlotte, Mr. Tredwell, of Suffolk, Mr. Zebulen Williams, of Queen's, Mr. Micheau, of Richmond, major Philip Van Cortlandt, of Westchester, Mr. Vanderbilt, of King's, and Mr. Smith, &c, and are hereby appointed a committee to prepare a draught of such resolve and letter as above mentioned, and report the same with all convenient speed.

Mr. Clarkson (seconded by colonel Ten Broeck) moving that every member of the congress be desired to sign the general association; which was agreed to and approved.

On Monday, May 29. The draught of a resolve reported by the committee appointed for that purpose, recommending the choosing of the committees and sub-committees, and signing the association, being read and amended, was approved, agreed to, and resolved, and is in the following words, to wit:

Resolved, That it be recommended, and it is accordingly hereby recommended, to all the counties in this colony (who have not already done it) to appoint county committees, and also sub-committees, for their respective townships, precincts and districts, without delay, in order to carry into execution the resolutions of the continental and this provincial congress. And that it is also recommended to every inhabitant of this colony who has hitherto neglected to sign the general association to do it with all convenient speed. And, for these purposes, that the committees in the respective counties in which committees have been formed, to tender the said association to every inhabitant within the several districts in each county; and that such persons, in those counties or districts who have not appointed committees, as shall be appointed by the members of this congress representing such counties and districts respectively, do make such tender as aforesaid in such counties and districts respectively; and that the said committees and persons respectively do return the said association, and the names of those who shall neglect or refuse to sign the same, to this congress, by the fifth day of July next, or sooner, if possible.

The draught of a letter to attend the said resolution, and recommending to carry the measures therein mentioned into execution was also read, amended and approved of, and is in the words following, to wit:

New York, May 24, 1775.

GENTLEMEN: You will see by the enclosed resolution of this congress, that it is recommended to such of the counties as have not already formed committees to do it without delay; and such of the inhabitants of this colony as have hitherto neglected to sign the general association to do it, so as to enable you to make a return within the time limited in the resolution.

As the execution of this resolve is committed to your care, we request you to use your best endeavors to see that this recommendation be complied with. It may nevertheless be proper to inform you that it is the sense of this congress that no coercive steps ought to be used to induce any person to sign the association. The propriety of the measure, the example of the other counties, and the necessity of maintaining a perfect union in every part of this colony, it is presumed, are sufficient reasons to induce the inhabitants of your county to comply with this requisition.

Ordered, That five hundred copies of the said resolve and of the said letter be printed, and that as many copies of the said letter as may be necessary be signed by the president, and delivered, with the copies of the said resolve, to the members of this congress to be by them directed.

In compliance with the order of the provincial congress of the 25th of May the association was signed by the following members:

JOHN PAUL JONES.

We present to our readers to-day two revolutionary documents, which, we are informed, have never been published. The first is a letter written by commodore Jones, dated March 7th, 1777, immediately after the malignant envy of his foes in America had succeeded in procuring his recall from his eastern command. It will be found to breathe the spirit of the times. [Philadelphia Herald.

Philadelphia March 7, 1777.

HONORED SIR: As I was lately entrusted with a very unexpected command of great importance, which in the common course of things, hath drawn upon me the envy of certain individuals. Being unconscious of any misconduct in the line of my duty, I have determined to bear no insinuation that may reflect upon me as a gentleman or an officer; I earnestly desire an opportunity of meeting the bearer or bearers, author or authors, of any aspersions from commodore Hopkins, face to face, in your presence, or in the presence of the marine board.

I mean to make no difficulty, or demur about my present appointment, but will leave you to judge how much room those who lately envied me the command of a fleet, will have to exult when they see me return to the eastward to command a single sloop of war.

I have put the plan, which I showed you, on the regulations and equipment of the navy, with some small additions, into the hands of the president, who says he will meet you at the marine board sooner than usual, this evening, in order to have some conversation on the subject. I am, with the most perfect esteem and grateful remembrance of past favors, honored sir, your truly obliged, very humble, most obedient servant, J. P. JONES.

The next is a copy of the original letter of credit or commendation, brought by count Pulaski from Rodrigue Hortalz & Co. of Paris, dated May 3, 1777. Our readers will recollect that R. Hortalz & Co. was the house with whom Dr. Franklin negotiated the first loan that the United States procured from any foreign power. France, at that period, had all her sympathies enlisted in the cause of the American arms, not from any particular knowledge of the American character, or from any abstract love of liberty, but from a long-cherished inveterate hatred of England. "To rob the British crown of its brightest jewel," she determined to extend to the colonies all the aid in her power.—The finances of the French government were inadequate to the supply of our wants. By the exertions of Franklin and Deane, Hortalz & Co. were induced to loan Louis XVI, the then reigning monarch of France, the sum of $3,000,000, for which the crown became responsible. The king, on making the loan, appropriated $2,000,000 to the use of the colonies, under the orders of the commissioners to that kingdom, and reserved the remaining one million to be disposed of at pleasure. To Beaumarchais was assigned the duty of disbursing this fund. The American commissioners drew for the $2,000,000—the balances they had no power to touch. On the return of the commissioners from France, a question was raised as to the appropriation of the remaining million, when the commissioners referred to the commissioners of the treasury of the United States to the French government. The subject constituted a chief difficulty in the relations of this country and France, until the embassy of Mr. Gallatin to France, after the close of the late war. The topic then being broached, M. the count de Vergennes declared to Mr. Gallatin that the sum had been disbursed for the use of the American government, and that the vouchers were on record, but gave no explanation of the mode of appropriation. It was supposed that it had been employed as secret service money in England, during the revolutionary war, and the explanation was deemed sufficient. This firm it was who gave to count Pulaski the subjoined letter, which will be read with interest, if only on account of the associations it awakens.

An exact narrative of the count Pulaski. The count Casimir enjoyed the most note in the troubles of that republic. He has sacrificed at the shrine of liberty an income of one hundred thousand livres per annum.

His father was the first author of the confederacy of Bur; he took up arms for the same cause that now actuates the Americans, and fell in its defence. Francois Pulaski, the elder, was killed in battle; the younger was made prisoner, and this one took up arms when 19 years old, and has borne them with success and glory from the first day of the confederation, until the three neighboring powers, uniting with a body of six hundred thousand men, encircled all the frontiers. Casimir Pulaski defended several forts, has given many battles, and surprised the fortress of Czenstokara, sustained thirty-two sieges against the flower of the Russian army and a corps of artillery, furnished by the king of Prussia—he found himself included in the affair of surprising and carrying off the king. The only part he had in this affair was the drawing out of Vassorie all the republican troops and giving them battle at ten leagues distance from that capital, while this operation was carrying into execution. But all his family were become very odious to the Russians, and they fell on him in particular all the severe punishment inflicted in consequence of this affair. When, therefore, the confederates were determined to lay down their arms by the line formed by the three powers, count Pulaski left his life in the fortress of Czenstokara, saying to his men they might make what accommodation they pleased; and he, though he had in his possession the whole treasury amassed by that ancient monastery, left Poland with only 100 ducats, and by the assistance of his friends, went over into Turkey, there to continue to wage war against the oppressors of his country? Peace was declared a few days after his arrival there, and this day he might return to Poland if he would disavow it, writing, all the proceedings of the confederacy of Bur; but as that would be disavowing the work of his family, and all the enterprises undertaken on his behalf, and as he had no other resource than to redeem his country from slavery, he prefers remaining an exile, and only aspires to make America his new country.

This narrative is contained in Messrs. Franklin and Deane's letters to general Washington, Mr. Hancock, &c. and is but a short and concise relation of the manly and vigorous conduct of M. the count de Pulaski in Poland, so well known and established in all Europe. And this we certify at Paris.

THE OLDEN TIME.

From the New York Daily Whig.

To amuse those of our readers, who may be curious in such matters, we propose occasionally to serve up a chapter of recollections gathered from the early history and records of New York. The following extracts are from the council minutes of the colony:

March 13, 1664.—Ordered, Indians not to drink strong liquor.

September 30, 1664.—John Decker, banished out of the government for having gone to Albany to stir up the Dutch.

December 22, 1664.—A warrant against Hendrick Thompson (the cow keeper) of Jamaica for having used scandalous and opprobrious speeches both against his majesty's royal person and his good subjects.

February 7, 1663.—A warrant against Adam Bower, for having uttered evil and scandalous speeches.

August 21, 1668.—Release (by the governor) to Ralph Hall and Mary his wife, for a recognizance they entered into at the assizes on a charge of witchcraft.

December 16, 1663.—Prices of grain, winter wheat 4s. and 6d. per bushel.—Summer wheat 4.—Rye 3s. and 6d.—Indian corn 2s. and 6d.

April 1, 1669.—The governor allows a horse race at Hempstead for the better breed of horses, &c.

May 28, 1669.—Rev. Mr. Vabrinsius had displeased the magistrates of Albany, in interfering in a marriage there. He is suspended from his ministerial functions; but the governor pardons him of the rest—allows him to celebrate the restoration of his majesty, provided he keeps within the bounds of moderation.

July 8, 1671.—Order of council on John Booth's complaint of the hard measure of levying upon his goods to pay the minister whom he says had denied to administer the "sacrament of baptism to his children." The minister answers that "for his life he cannot be compelled thereto." The council order a letter to be written to the minister and communication to the inhabitants—that more charity and moderation be used towards his neighbors for the future.

September 26, 1671.—An order of the governor on all the physicians to attend a poor woman that says lame in Pearl street, New York. "She is called the old ferryman's wife of Communipaw."

January 9, 1672.—An order prohibiting handling with the Indians at Schenectady; stating that it may prove a great prejudice to the town of Albany.

March 21, 1672.—The governor orders the town of Hempstead to pay its schoolmaster.

July 6, 1672.—Declaration of war between England and Holland read in council.

September 6, 1672.—Schenectady allowed a town out to try maters to the amount of 100 guilders.

October 14, 1672.—Daniel Suttin discharged on prison at the extraordinary time of his royal highness' birth day, and a new election of mayor is taken.

November 3, 1672.—Proclamation against Richard Latin for uttering malicious and traitorous oros against his royal highness, the duke of York; and also vile and abusive speeches against the governor.

November 19, 1672.—John Cooper bound over for evil words against the government.

November 20, 1672.—Pardon to John Cooper give the Indians "a gill of liquor now and then."

February 16, 1675.—A warrant against Peter Ilet; "who doth pretend, and has reported, to have seen sights or visions in this city and fort, which tends to the disquiet and disturbance of his majesty's subjects in those parts."

May 12, 1676.—A warrant against a woman for being her husband, "being deluded away by one Thomas Case, and that she acts in a dancing quacking manner, with silly and insignificant discourses."

July 26, 1676.—An order against all drunken Indians—"and if any be seen coming drunk out of a house, that house shall be fined, and if the house be unknown, and the Indian be found in the street, the whole street shall be fined." No butcher to be a carrier, shoemaker, or tanner; and no tanner to be either carrier, shoemaker, or butcher.

August 17, 1676.—Resolved, That Albany shall have no more privileges than this place, (New York).

At a court, May 19, 1677, whether attorneys are thought useful to plead in court or not? It's thought not, but to be as Nevis, Jamaica, &c.—Whereupon, Resolved and ordered, That pleading attorneys be no longer allowed to practice in the government, but for the depending causes.

TOURNAMENTS AND CHIVALRY IN THE OLDEN TIMES.

From the Corsair.

"Firm in his stirrups, with collected might He stood; and to direct his spear aright, Against the buckler drove the pointed wood, Which, like a mount of steel, the shock withstood. The foe with mightier force his helmet found. And instant buried him senseless to the ground."

Ariosto.

Three valiant and noble knights of France, Sir Boucicaut, the lord Reignald de Roye, and the lord de Saimp, resolved to hold a solemn tournament at Inglevere, near Calais, in which they undertook to maintain the lists against all comers. This tournament was proclaimed in many countries, particularly in England, where, as the quaint old chronicler observes, "it excited several knights and squires who were fond of adventures and deeds of arms, to confer on the subject."

More than sixty English knights and squires accompanied Sir John Holland, earl of Huntingdon, the king's half brother, to this tournament. Among them were Sir Peter Courtenay, Sir John Drayton, Sir John Walworth, Sir John Russel, Sir Peter Shirborne, Sir William Clifton, Sir Peter Shirborne, Sir William Talbot, Sir Godfrey de Seyton, Sir John Bolton, Sir John Arundel, Sir John Beaumont, and many others. All of these took up their quarters at Calais.

On the arrival of the challengers, they ordered three rich vermilion tents or pavilions to be pitched near the place appointed for the lists, and before each were suspended two shields, for peace or war, (that is, with blunt or sharpened lances), emblazoned with the arms of each challenger. Such were desirous of performing any deeds of arms were to touch one of these shields, when they would be tilted with, agreeably to their request.

On the 21st of May, the three nights were properly armed, and their horses ready saddled, according to the laws of the tournament. The English knights also came from Calais, and being arrived at the spot, drew up on one side. The place of the tournament was smooth and green with grass.

Sir John Holland was the first who sent his squire to touch the war shield of Sir Boucicaut, who instantly issued from his pavilion completely armed. Having mounted his horse and grasped his spear, they took their distance. When the two knights had for a short time eyed each other, they spurred their horses, and met full gallop with such force that Sir Boucicaut pierced the shield of his adversary, and the point of his lance slipped under his arm, but without wounding him. The knights continued their career, without stopping, to the end of the lists. This course was much praised.

In the second course they hit each other slightly, but no harm was done; and their horses refused to complete the third. Sir John Holland who was heated, wished to complete the tilt, and returned to his place, expecting that Boucicaut would again call for his lance; but he did not, and showed plainly that he would not that day tilt any more with Sir John. The English knight, therefore, sent his squire to touch the war shield of the lord de Saimp, who, being ready for the combat, sallied out from his pavilion, and grasped his lance. The two champions couched their lances, but at the outset their horses crossed, yet, notwithstanding this, their horses met at their career, but in consequence of the crossing (which was much blamed) Sir John was unhelm'd.

He returned to his people, who soon rehelm'd him; and having resumed their lances, they met full gallop, and hit each other with such force in the middle of their shields that they would have been unhorsed had they not kept tight seats. They returned to their places, and took breath. They returned, John Holland, who had a great desire to distinguish himself at this tournament, had his helmet braced, and grasped his spear again. The lord de Saimp, seeing him advance did not decline the encounter, but spurring his horse to full gallop, they met in the midst of the lists, their spurs striking each on the other's helmet, from which the spears were made to fly. At this course the lord de Saimp lost his helmet. Sir John Holland wished to break another lance in honor of his lady, but it was refused him because he had already run his six courses. He therefore quitted the lists to make way for others, his courage and dexterity having gained him praise from all sides.

After several other courses had been run, Sir Peter Courtenay sent a squire to touch the three shields of war. This caused a great deal of surprise, but the knight declared that he wished to break twolances with each of the champions. Sir Reignald de Roye first offered himself, but from the restiveness of their horses, they both failed in the attempt. On the second course they met full gallop, and Sir Reignald de Roye, having unhelm'd his adversary, returned gently towards his pavilion, his two courses being completed.

Sir Peter Courtenay and the lord de Saimp now ran together, and their lances were broken in the first shock. In the next encounter the lord Saimp hit Sir Peter hard, whose horse swerved a little; but Sir Peter struck off the Frenchman's helmet, and rode on to his post. Sir Boucicaut now came to complete the two remaining courses; and in the first the two knights met with such fire and impetuosity that both challengers fell back on their haunches, but no other result followed. At the second course they were both unhelm'd. Sir Peter Courtenay was then told he had done enough that day, and he retired from the lists.

Sir Peter Shirborne, a young knight of good courage, sent his squire to touch the war shield of Sir Boucicaut. The knight was ready to answer him, for he was armed and on horseback, leaning his spear, and eager for an adventure. In the first course their horses swerved, but in the next career their lances took good effect upon the visor of each. The lances of the French knight shivered, but that of the Englishman bore off the helmet of Sir Boucicaut, and the champion was obliged to retire to his pavilion. Then advanced the lord de Saimp against Sir Peter Shirborne, and well did these valiant gentlemen maintain their reputations. The first course was attended without loss to either knight, but in the second their lances stuck against their shields, and broke in three pieces; but the blow of lord de Saimp was so fierce that the English knight lost his seat, and fell to the ground. He was then led from the lists by his attendants.

The sports now concluded for that day, and the English set off at full gallop for Calais, where they remained all night enjoying themselves. The French retired to Inglevere.

The next morning, after mass and drinking a cup, the English again left Calais, and repaired to the lists, where they found the French knights awaiting them, as was most right and proper. After supper, the English again set out, and Sir Godfrey de Seyton opposed himself to Sir Reignald de Roye. They met full gallop, and though their spears were too tough to break, they remained fastened in their shields whilst their horses with difficulty recovered from the shock of the encounter. In the next course Sir Reignald received a severe blow on the helmet, but he repaid the thrust well, for that time he was accounted one of the best knights in France, and was smitten with love for a young lady that made all his affairs prosper. "He now struck so violent a blow against the shield of Sir Godfrey that it was pierced through as well as his left arm. The spear broke as it entered, the rest falling to the ground, and the steelhead sticking in the shield and in the arm. Sir Reignald was much praised both by French and English for this tilt.

There was a Bohemian knight attached to the household of the queen of England, who challenged Sir Boucicaut to tilt with him. But the Bohemian conducted himself in so unkindly a manner that he got out of the line of tilting, and then struck his opponent on the helmet. By this impropriety he forfeited his arms and horse, but the Frenchman insisted upon it. After a good deal of conversation upon this foul stroke, the French knight pardoned it out of complaisance to the English. The Bohemian then begged to be permitted to run one course with Sir Reignald de Roye, who granted his request. Both knights spurred their horses and struck each other's shields at the same moment; but Sir Reignald thrust with such force and good intent that he made the Bohemian fly out of his saddle, and the spectators leared he was killed. The champion continued his course to his own station, and the English were not sorry to behold the condition of the Bohemian after the discourteous act he had committed.

The tilting continued four days, when their apparel to be no more tilters to encounter the challengers, who had conducted themselves most worthily. The English, therefore, returned with many expressions of admiration and satisfaction, and returned to their own country. The three French knights remained till the thirty days were fully accomplished, and then returned leisurely each to his home. The king of France and all his lords received them most handsomely, and thus ended the famous tilting at Inglevere.

CHRONICLE.

Hon. Richard Fletcher, M. C. from Suffolk district, Mass. has resigned his seat in the 26th congress. The Boston Transcript says it knows not the inducement to this unexpected determination, which is understood to be positive, but the place of one so strong in controversy, and so argumentative in debate, so straight forward and honest in purpose, yet so bland and conciliatory in manner, will not and cannot be easily supplied.

The express mail ceased to run on the 1st instant. Under the new arrangement, the regular mail from N. Orleans is to be conveyed to this city in eight days, and to New York in nine days.

Whole ships. The Journal of Commerce says: "The delegation of gentlemen from New Bedford to wait on the secretary of the treasury, on the subject of the late change of regulations relative to whole ships, have returned having found at Washington all the disposition which could be desired to favor their views. We hope the secretary will, upon reflection, think it right to adjourn the operation of the new order of things until the decision of judge Story is reviewed before the supreme court. The design of congress and that the policy of the country is well understood, that every body was certain that so great a mischief as threatens the whalersmen from the sudden change of policy, should be avoided.

Upwards of 500,000 persons have been conveyed on the Trenton rail road since its completion, and out of that large number it is asserted that only two have been injured, viz: Mr. Steel, who was recently killed, and another who lost the use of his hand by an accident which occurred about twelve months ago. Both of these persons were outside of the cars, smoking cigars, and neither, it is said, would have been hurt, had he occupied his seat in the car.

The public lands ceded to the United States in each of the states and territories amount to more than three hundred millions of acres. If to the quantity unsold lying within the limits of the states, the amount in the territories and regions beyond be added, the aggregate, according to the official statement of the commissioners of the general land office, will exceed nine hundred millions of acres. This, it has been estimated, would furnish every man, woman, and child in the United States with a farm from fifty to seventy-five acres in extent.

Galignani's Paris Messenger announces the publication, by order of the minister of the marine, of a new general chart of the Banks of Newfoundland, formed by captain Lyvaud and the officers of the surveying expedition, rectifying the numerous important errors of former charts.

Distressing casualty. An interesting little boy, two years old, son of Mr. Williams, of the Buffalo theatre, got some part of a flower in his throat, which, before it could be extracted, produced death by suffocation.

Suicide. The Albany Daily Advertiser says: Maria Harris, a daughter of Lou Harris, of the town of Amity, Alleghany county, N. Y., 25th ult. about 17 years of age, put an end to her existence by hanging herself in a room just put up adjoining the house her father lived in. The particulars of the transaction or the cause of so foolish a step, we have not learned.

Travellers. The number of people moving about at this time is wonderfully great. The Massachusetts, from Providence, came in yesterday morning with near six hundred passengers. There were one hundred and eighty in the cabin, and poor creatures, they could not all of them get either birth, settee, or a plank of the floor. The gentlemen bivouacked on the decks, and covered them completely.

Cool summer. An astronomer at Hempstead, Long Island, says he has counted, in the month of June, no less than eleven spots on the sun's disc. They are constantly shifting.

Frontier burning. A gang of ten refugees from Canada, without provocation, cowardly burnt a few evenings since, a barn at Barnston, just within the Canada line, bordering on Vermont, and then escaped into that state.

A good business. There is a lady in the west, who makes a good business in conducting slander suits—the Centerville (Indiana) Chronicle of the 3d, says of the circuit court there—

An action of slander was tried, which resulted in a verdict of $500 against the defendant. The same plaintiff, a young lady, about six months ago, in a similar action, against another individual, recovered a verdict of $1,000. A few such verdicts as these will effectually bridle the tongue of the slanderer.

Stage accident. At New Bedford on Monday the Taunton stage was upset in a tight corner. Captain Thomas Durberry, of New York, had his shoulder dislocated; Mr. Brooks, of Nantucket, suffered dislocation of an ankle and was otherwise injured, and Mrs. Lydia Macy, wife of Josiah Macy, esq. of Nantucket, was severely bruised. Several other passengers also sustained considerable injury.

Newspaper for the blind. A weekly newspaper for the blind was established at Palermo, in Sicily, on the 15th of March last. The name of the blind man is called "Il Consola otre de Cicchi"—literally, "The Consoler of the Blind." The letters in which it is printed, are, of course, in relief; and are read by the blind by passing the finger over the line.

The St. Louis Bulletin of the 26th June says—"We perceive that Messrs. Kingsland & Latham are bringing bituminous coal from Peoria. The Missouri and Illinois coal fields in this neighborhood, not answering for the manufacture of the finer parts of machinery, were obliged to bring it from Pittsburgh at a cost of about 50 cents a bushel; coal equally as good can be delivered here from Peoria at 18 cents a bushel. This no doubt, will be the opening of an extensive trade, of mutual benefit to both places. Their establishment alone consumes about 10,000 bushels annually.

Value of the coal trade. The immense value of the coal trade to the city of Philadelphia is shown in the following statement of the comparative number of arrivals at that port during the first six months of 1837, 1838 and 1839.

Table with 3 columns: Year, Foreign, Coastwise, Total. 1837: 207, 1,413, 1,525. 1838: 205, 3,840, 4,045. 1839: 235, 4,534, 4,769.

Showing an increase in the total arrivals of 1839 over those of 1837 of 714 vessels, and an increase over 1837 of 3,144.

It will be observed that for every foreign arrival during the last six months there have been no less than twenty coastwise arrivals, and of the latter perhaps nineteen have been vessels employed in the transportation of anthracite coal from Philadelphia to other ports.—Here is a domestic commerce in a single item which is of itself sufficient to sustain a large city.

Michigan flour. The Detroit Free Press estimates the number of barrels of flour shipped from Detroit this season at 100,000. From Toledo 35,000, making the exports from the eastern side of the Peninsula worth $1,000,000! The amount sent down the St. Joseph, Kalamazoo and Grand rivers, and conveyed otherwise to Lake Michigan, is estimated at equal to 70,000 barrels, worth $5,000,000. The Free Press thinks it a safe estimate to say that the surplus of the last year's harvest may be valued at two millions of dollars!

The tolls on the New York canals for April, May and June, amounted to $616,935. For the same months of 1838, $14,931. Excess of 1839 over 1838, $102,004.

The Pensacola Gazette says—"Lieut. Palmer, of the United States topographical engineers, has we understand, been engaged during the week in making an examination of Yellow river, and we are gratified to learn that he deems it practicable to open and improve the navigation of that stream some distance beyond the Alabama line. $500 was appropriated at the last session of congress for a survey of the Yellow river."

Inspections of tobacco at Petersburg, inspected in the month of June.

Table with 4 columns: Previously, Passed, Previously, Refused. Total: 834 hhds.

The Annapolis, Maryland, Republican mentions a mulberry tree growing on a farm near the Seven river, the body of which measures twenty-two feet in circumference at some distance from the ground, and the diameter of limbs in full proportion. It is in full foliage, and the owner was a few days since offered thirty dollars to allow it to be stripped of its leaves.

Williams, the homicide. All interference made to governor Porter on behalf of this wretched individual have at length proved fruitless. The governor, we understand from information which arrived from Harrisburg on Saturday last, has signed his death warrant. He is to expiate the crime of which he has been convicted on the gallows, on the 5th of next August.

The domestication of the wolf. There is going the round of an article from the learned Frederick Curvier to prove that wolves may be domesticated—that their anatomy is the same as the dog's nearly, &c. Now one fact is better than all speculation. In the early history of this country, on Long Island for example, one of the greatest nuisances, the white settlers encountered on the eastern extremity, was the quantity of wolves the Indians had trained up as dogs. Any one familiar with our Indian tribes generally, particularly those of the Rocky mountains, knows that the Indian dog, is virtually a lineal descendant of the wolf. The same in Kamschatka, Asia, and this is one of the illustrations the lamented Dr. Mitchell was accustomed to give, in proof of the identity of some of the rude paintings on deer skins with Egyptian symbols.

Progress of common schools in Kentucky. The Louisville Journal mentions that the Rev. H. H. Kavanaugh, superintendent of public instruction, in making the tour of the Green River country, and his visit has been eminently successful in enlisting the active cooperation of that region of the state in favor of the public school system.

The army. The resignations of the following officers have been accepted by the president, to take effect at the dates set opposite their respective names: Lieut. Col. S. Burbank, 5th infantry, June 30, 1839. Capt. John Bradley, 2d infantry, June 30, 1839. First lieut. W. H. Betts, 1st artillery, June 20, 1839. First lieut. J. McAlister, 1st infantry, June 10, 1839.

Naval. The Monitor Atlas says that there are four vessels now lying at the navy yard, Charleston, nearly ready for service, viz: the United States, Columbus, Concord and Marion. The United States is a frigate of the 1st class, and rates 44 guns. She is entirely fitted for service, and lies at the lower end of the yard. The Columbus is still employed as a receiving vessel, and has a large number of recruits attached to her, and a school on board for boys apprenticed to the navy, conducting about 40 pupils. These apprentices receive a good English education, and are instructed in seamen's duty. The plan of naval schools has been in operation about one year.

The Concord is a sloop of war, of the 2d class, and rates 18 guns. She is now ready for service, and is only waiting for orders. The Marion is a new and beautiful sloop of war, of the 3d class, 16 guns, and is also ready for service.—She was launched about three months since.

The old frigate Constellation is in the dry dock, undergoing thorough repairs.

The new rope walk at the navy yard works admirably; the machinery is well managed, and is capable of manufacturing upwards of 800 tons of rope and cordage per annum. This is the only establishment of the kind connected with the navy. It is a fine stone building, with a slat roof, 1,350 feet in length, including the head, where the machinery is placed.—The rope manufactured is of a very superior quality.

The North Carolina is to be masted in the Buttermill channel near New York, as the receiving and school ship for apprentices.

The Hudson is to be laid up in ordinary.

The Fulton steamship is now lying at New York.

The schooner Enterprise, now lying at our navy yard, from a cruise in the Pacific, is ordered to be immediately fitted out.

The United States ships Columbia and John Adams, for Manila and China were at Singapore on the 18th of February.

The French brig of war Oréste, capt. Marc, of 30 guns, from Martinique, arrived in Hampton Roads on Monday afternoon, and went up on Tuesday to the naval anchorage; shortly after which she exchanged salutes with the U. S. frigate Java.

A proposition has been made in New York, to erect a monument to the memory of William Leggett; a correspondent corrects the suggestion, and proposes that an annuity be purchased for his widow, who is left destitute, and women whom he loved much, and whom he was indebted for solace in trouble, for watchful care in sickness, and for delightful companionship in every vicissitude. This is the monument. [Philad. U. S. Gazette.

In Bedford, Trimble county, Kentucky, an encounter took place between two cousins named Smith and Hill, in which Hill was stabbed and killed.

The Lowell, (Mass.) Courier, says a Miss Lydia Brewster, was found yesterday morning, about 8 o'clock, suspended by her stays strings to a clothes hook in her chamber, at No. 11, Boot corporation, in this city. The girl who roomed with her left her in bed at 6 o'clock. She had been well for a short time, and occasionally showed symptoms of delirium.

A mercantile library is about to be established at Richmond—$2,000 having been already subscribed towards the object.

The notes of the Illinois banks are not received at the land offices, and to avoid the drains for specie they are compelled to limit their business to the smallest compass. The receivers, it is stated, will take only specie or St. Louis bank notes in payment for lands.

Bunker Hill. At a recent dinner given by the late mayor of London, the veteran gen. Wetherell, now in his 84th year, was present and toasted. He returned thanks for the compliment, stated that he had been nearly 30 years in the service of his country, and mentioned a year in the most important part of the battle of Bunker Hill. When the old gentleman dies, the Yankee chronicler ought to say, "Another revolutionary patriot gone."

The Athens (Geo.) Banner announces the death of the hon. A. S. Clayton, formerly a representative in congress from Georgia. He died on the 21st ult.

The Savannah (Geo.) Republican announces the death of gen. John Floyd, a gallant soldier, who died at his residence in Camden county, on the 24th ultimo. He also formerly represented the state of Georgia in congress.

The Army and Navy Chronicle is authorized to say that the minor gen. T. Ap. Catesby Jones who offered his services to Texas, has no foundation who ever he has never entertained the remotest thought leaving the service of his native country to embark in any other.

NILES' NATIONAL REGISTER.

FIFTH SERIES. No. 21.—VOL. VI.]

BALTIMORE, JULY 20, 1839.

[VOL. LVI.—WHOLE No. 1,451

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE

TO THE SUBSCRIBERS TO THE REGISTER.

In consequence of the greatly increased cost of publishing the "REGISTER" in Washington city, and other reasons not necessary to state here, I determined at the close of the last session of congress to return with my establishment to Baltimore; but before I could complete my arrangements for that purpose the death of my father occurred—which melancholy event increased the difficulties with which I had to contend, and caused the suspension of the "REGISTER" until the present period,—from which it will be published, in this city with its former regularity, and with, I hope, increased evidences of zeal and industry.

In again resuming the publication of this time-honored work, I cannot refrain from expressing my grateful acknowledgments to my numerous friends in various sections of the union for the deep interest they have manifested in my personal affairs, and for the speedy resumption of the publication of the REGISTER; and I know they will learn with pleasure that, if the subscribers to the work (of which have not for many years been so numerous as at present) will make some amends for their past neglect and pay their subscriptions with a moderate degree of punctuality, it will soon be placed in its old and prosperous condition, and may continue, for another generation, an "honest chronicle" of the events of the times, to which all may resort in the confident belief that "the truth, and the whole truth" is fairly and fully stated.

Several of the omitted numbers have already been forwarded to the subscribers—the remainder, with the indices, will be completed with all possible despatch; and for the future the work will be punctually forwarded on the day of its publication, and so securely packed as to ensure its safe arrival in the most distant sections of the union.

Very respectfully,

WM. OGDEN NILES.

Baltimore, July 20, 1839.

Our editorial brethren with whom we "exchange," will please forward their papers to us at Baltimore, instead of Washington city.

OFFICIAL. Navy department, July 11, 1839. The board for the examination of midshipmen, convened at the naval asylum, Philadelphia, on the 24th ultimo, has closed its proceedings, a report of which was received at the department, and approved on the 8th inst.

The following is a list of the midshipmen in the order in which they passed:

TREASURY NOTES AND SPECIE CIRCULARS. We see it stated in some New York whig paper, that difficulties in the money market exist in consequence of transactions made by some of the country banks with the federal government as to treasury notes.

On inquiry, we find that no such notes have been issued to a single country bank in the state of New York, except one, and that only to the amount of a few thousand dollars, instead of many millions, as is represented.

Another statement is, that the banks are exposed to a drain for entering land under the new order of government. But we learn that no new order has been issued on that subject since the repeal of the specie circular in 1835; and that any difficulties which now arise in the receipt of bank paper, are such as have always existed if some of it is not at par, or equivalent to specie, where it is deposited or paid out. [Globe, of the 18th inst.]

LAND OFFICE MONEY. The notes of the Illinois banks are not received at the land offices; and, to avoid the drains for specie, they are compelled to limit their business to the smallest compass. The receiver, it is stated, will take only specie or St. Louis bank notes in payment for lands.

[Bicknell's Reporter.]

An article similar to the above has been circulating some days, and originated, we believe, in Wall street, that mint of panics and misrepresentations. Such poisoned arrows injure the banks more than the public officer against whom they are recklessly aimed. On inquiry in the proper quarter, we find that the statement is entirely incorrect, the notes of the state bank and others in Illinois being received at the different land offices, like all other notes of specie-paying banks, when they are at par with specie where they are to be paid out or deposited.

No discrimination is made at the treasury in favor or against any particular bank. Every person can see that it would be suicidal and absurd for the receivers to take those notes, or any others, if not equal to specie, as the public creditors have a right to demand payment in specie; and it would be in principle as unjust and partial to receive them, if one or two per cent. below par at any particular place, as it would be to receive them if at a still greater discount. [Globe.]

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. Algernon Sidney Lewis, receiver of public moneys at New Orleans, vice Thos. H. Kennedy, resigned.

Parker Dudley, receiver of public moneys at Palmyra, Missouri, vice Abraham Bird, removed.

Thomas A. S. Doniphan, collector of the customs, Natchez, Mississippi, vice James Stockman, who did not qualify.

FROM FLORIDA. A letter from Garey's Ferry, under date of 3d inst. says:

The Indians have been in large numbers to fort Mellon and fort King, and all report their entire willingness and determination to go within the designated boundaries and there remain. Every means will be tried to secure them the peaceful possession of the allotted territory, and if nothing uncommon takes place, the wise ones say that the great, everlasting Florida war, is at length closed.

The Alexandria Gazette contains the following dated,

St. Augustine, E. F. July 7, 1839.

A schooner arrived here a few days ago from Cape Florida, by which we learn that Sam Jones has been in several times at fort Landeale, and is perfectly willing to comply with the arrangement entered into by general Macomb, with some common Indians at fort King, whom the negro interpreter, Sandy, had dubbed chiefs! Sandy acknowledged in this place that he appointed Tuste-Nuggee, with whom general Macomb had the "treaty," "successor" to Sam Jones! Sam, however, altho' thus unceremoniously deposed by Sandy, has too much sense to quarrel about the medium through which the great war chief of the whites acknowledged himself whipped; provided he obtains all the results of victory.

The New Orleans Bee says, "public meetings have been held in St. Augustine, Tallahassee, Apalachicola, and other places, disapproving of the late negotiation with the Seminoles. A gentleman from Florida, informs us that general discontent prevails among the population, and that the terms of the treaty—if treaty it may be termed—will not be agreed to by the Floridians."

VILLAINOUS DEED. The St. Augustine News, of the 6th, has the following.—The deaths of captain MITCHELL and lieutenant PUGLI, as well as twelve soldiers, we learn, is attributed to poison. Col. DAVENPORT and three surgeons are stated to be under its influence, and for whose recovery fears are entertained. A keg of white lead was discovered in the spring from whence their supplies of water were obtained. As yet the perpetrators of this villainous deed have not been found out.

CANADIAN AFFAIRS. A row occurred at Cobourgh, U. C. at a recent meeting of reformers. It is stated that the populace carried standards inscribed "Durham and reform!" and that, after they were collected together, a band of malcontents and British officers assaulted them with shillelals, and demanded the surrender of the flags. This was refused; and an attempt being made to force them, one of the bearers presented a pistol and attempted twice to fire it. He was seized, horribly mangled, and carried off. The flags were taken, Durham's name torn, and the whole torn into a thousand shreds, and trampled on with contempt.

In the closing part of the day, a new attack was made upon the reformers. One was pursued in his wagon, who fired twice on his pursuers. Neither shot took effect.

One man was seized and rode upon a rail, and others took shelter under heaps of shavings, in cellars, in the woods, &c.

The Lewistown Telegraph gives an account of two burnings near Queenston—one of the barns and outhouses belonging to Dr. Newburn, at Stamford, and the other, the house and barns of Mr. Overhaul, at Short Hills. They were both the work of incendiaries, and both were the property of conspicuous loyalists.

The Kingston Chronicle announces the arrest of Martin Kelly, alias Mills, said to have been concerned in robbing the mail last spring, and in the destruction of the sir Robert Peel.

The British government, it is said, intends to erect a block house on Fighting Island, which commands both channels of the Detroit river.

We learn by the Upper Canada papers, that the customary Orange processions are not to take place this year.

INDIAN WAR. The Peoria Register gives the following items respecting the war which young Hawk is waging against the Sioux:

It seems that they were out in search of the Sioux only, and that coming upon the combined bands near the neutral ground, a tract of land that separates the former and latter tribes, they (the Sioux and Mohawks) held up a red blanket in token of friendship, but which unfortunately carried a different impression to the bosoms of the ferocious Sacs, who instantly rushed upon them, and without resistance, killed and captured men, women and children, to the number of twenty-five or thirty.

And now at their town on the Des Moines, and far in the distance may be heard the fierce shouts and triumphant yells, as, in their ecstasy, they dance around the post where hangs the ghastly scalps of the dead, and where are tied their disconsolate captives.

The following belongs to the same subject: Extract of a letter to the editor, dated Des Moines trading house, June 5, 1839:

Our Indians, (Sacs and Foxes) are all at war at present. A party came in a few days since, bearing scalps and eleven prisoners! They are so elated with their success, that they have all turned out, men, young and old, boys, dogs, and all.

Several of the New Orleans papers are printed in French and English.

CANAL ACROSS THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA. The Republic of New Granada has granted to a company the privilege of making a canal, rail road, or Macadamised road over this isthmus. In 1836, this privilege was accorded to col. Charles Biddle. The conditions of the privilege not having been fulfilled, it has been granted to a company associated with the house of Salomon and Co. of Guadalope. The agent of this company is now in Europe, with the view of raising the means, and making the preparations for this enterprise.

The conditions of the contract are concisely these:

1. The intermarine communication must terminate at one end, in the town of Panama. It may be a canal, a rail road, or Macadamised road.
2. If a canal be made, the duties of transportation to accrue to the government, shall be one per cent. on the navigation of the river Chagres, in canoes, shall not be interrupted.
3. Vessels under the New Granada flag, shall pay ten per cent. less toll than those of other nations; that is ten per cent. of the toll.
4. This privilege shall continue fifty years, from the completion of the work, for which six years are allowed.
5. The company shall begin their operations in three years from the date of the contract. Failing to comply with this condition, they shall pay $25,000 penalty to the state.
6. At the end of the term of this privilege, (fifty years), the canal shall become the property of the Republic.

It may safely be predicted that the funds for making this canal, under the present contract, will never be raised. Contrary to the usual inducement to embark in such enterprises, that of an increasing value in the stock, in the present case, the stock must diminish in value every day, since it must become the property of the state at the end of fifty years. [Globe.]

At the last session of congress, Mr. Mercer, from the committee on roads and canals, made a report in the house of representatives, on the subject of an improved communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, at the isthmus of Panama, which closed with the following resolution:

“Resolved, that the president of the United States be requested to consider the expediency of opening or continuing negotiations with the governments of other nations, and particularly with those, the territorial jurisdiction of which comprehends the isthmus of Panama, and to which the United States have accredited ministers or agents, for the purpose of ascertaining the practicability of effecting a communication between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, by the construction of a ship channel across the isthmus; and of securing forever, by suitable treaty stipulations, the free and equal right of navigating such canal to all nations, on the payment of reasonable tolls.”

This report was taken up by the house, so soon as made, and the resolution above, adopted without a division. So far, therefore, the house of representatives has exhibited a disposition decidedly favorable to the construction of a ship canal at Panama, if such a work shall be found practicable.—Doubtless it will be found “practicable”—for what is not so, to the means and enterprise of the nineteenth century? And doubtless, a canal across the isthmus, and affording a short cut to the commerce of the world, between the two great oceans, is one of the things to be done, within the next twenty years. [Nat. Int.]

TRIUMPH OF AMERICAN MECHANICS. It is with great pleasure we extract from the London Morning Journal of June 1st, the following voluntary tribute to the skill of our mechanics. In addition, we are informed that the directors of the Grand Junction company placed on their railway the best of their English locomotives out of fifty-two, to compete with Mr. Norris's. The latter, however, notwithstanding her greatly inferior weight, was victorious.

The English locomotive weighed 15 tons, with 12 inch cylinders, 18 inch stroke, and 5 feet driving wheels. The Philadelphia locomotive weighed only 8 tons, with 10 inch cylinders, 18 inch stroke, and 4 feet driving wheels. The latter in gross was 120 tons. [U. S. Gazette.]

American locomotive engines. It will be recollected that a contract had been entered into between the Birmingham and Gloucester railway company, and Mr. Norris, of Philadelphia, U. S. for the supply of locomotives for the Gloucester railway. The contract was conditionally made, on the first engine manufactured by Mr. N. performing certain work agreed upon. As much interest has been felt in this country with reference to the contract, and as some doubts were entertained as to the correctness of the representations made respecting these engines, we have pleasure in giving the following particulars as to the engine sent over to this country by Mr. Norris, and the work it has actually performed on the Grand Junction railway, in conformity with the agreement to which we have alluded.

The engine weighs about eight tons without water or fuel; she is built much lower and smaller than the engines commonly in use here, and has six wheels, the driving pair being four feet in diameter. The cylinders are ten and a half inches in diameter, and are enclosed in proper cases to prevent radiation—the stroke eighteen inches. The machinery is of the simplest construction, and consists of a much smaller number of parts than we have been accustomed to see. The cylinders are placed on the outside of the framework, which allows the advantage of a straight axle; and the general appearance of the engine more nearly resembles that of the old Rocket engine than any with which we are acquainted. The engine is got up in a most superior style, and finished, even to the most minute particular, in a very beautiful and workmanlike manner, every part having been executed with perfect accuracy, by means of self-acting machinery. As a proof, indeed, of the mathematical correctness of the work, we may mention that the steam-tight joints are formed simply by the bringing into contact of metallic surfaces; the workmanship of which is so true as entirely to supersede the necessity of packing of any kind. The boiler is similar to those used in engines manufactured in this country, but it contains only seventy-eight tubes, instead of from one hundred to one hundred and forty, the number commonly used in those on our railways; and the consumption of fuel, compared with the work performed, is, we understand, very small.

The task undertaken to be performed by the England was, to run from Birmingham to Warrington, fourteen journeys each way, carrying one hundred tons in the gross, and performing the distance, eighty miles, at the rate of twenty miles per hour, which the engine has accomplished considerably within the specified time of four hours; the average time having been about 3 hours 50 minutes, or the actual running time, without stoppages, from 3 h. 9 mins. to 3 h. 19 mins. On one occasion, it is stated that the engine brought into Birmingham the enormous load of 126 tons, drawing it up the inclined planes without any assistance; and on no occasion has it failed to perform the required duty, nor has even the least derangement of any part of the machinery taken place. It should also be mentioned, that the various parts were never put together until its arrival in this country, when they were first fitted at Liverpool, the day previous to making a trip; nor has a tool been applied to the engine since she was first set up. We understand the conditional order to Mr. Norris for ten engines of similar capability, has been confirmed.

Cr, by cash on account;	1,500 00
Balance due	$654 27 1/2

Gentlemen: I have examined this bill, as the manufacturer of the fringe, tassels and rope, and find the prices to be the usual upholsterer's charge. Respectfully, [Signed] JOHN JOHNSON, 487 Broadway, New York, Feb. 13, 1839.

I have the best reason to believe that the charges made in the written bill are such as afford to the detractors of the work nothing more than a reasonable profit, and such as are paid by private persons for the same materials and labor.

[Signed] T. L. SMITH.

MEXICO. The New Orleans Louisianaian contains the articles of capitulation of the town of uspan to the government forces. One of the conditions is, that gen. Ureia, leader of the insurrectionary movements, shall continue in the entire enjoyment of his employment and his honors, being discharged from all responsibility for his conduct as commander of the troops which were given him by the 28th December, 1833. The signers of the articles are gen. Paredes, on the part of the government, and gen. Ureia, on the part of the town.

MEXICO AND TEXAS.—Letters from Mexico, received at New Orleans, contain intimations which could seem to have no doubt that the invasion of Texas is seriously contemplated by the Mexican government. The following letter, which we copy from the Bee, throws some light upon the movements of Mexico and her designs in regard to Texas:—

Of the political events that have befallen, and the high-handed measures of Santa Ana, you are doubtless fully informed. You, perhaps, do not know, however, that gen. Cortazar has for some time been very ill treated by Santa Ana, and since the capitulation of Tampico, it is manifest that ever since the assassination of the heroic Mejia, both Cortazar and Bustamante have been in close correspondence with Ureia. This and the facility with which Arista (whom Santa Ana hates) possessed himself of Tampico, have created some doubts and misgivings in the mind of his excellency as to the final issue of this ambitious project; in consequence, he has proposed Bravo to be elected president of the "contingent gobierno," and gives out that he intends retiring to his farm for the re-establishment of his health; at the same time, the impressment of soldiers goes on as hotly as ever, and even more actively—and for what purpose?

There are but two assignable reasons, unless they be apprehensive that the French will still give them trouble, that the one is to firmly establish a military despotism, and the other to invade Texas, and the government is exerting all its power to induce England to receive Texas in part payment of its debt. Perhaps it intends making one grand effort to lay the country in ruins, and drive out the inhabitants, in order to accomplish this end. The convocation of a popular national assembly is said to be in contemplation, with the view of forging permanently a constitution and government, according to the wishes of the majority of the nation.

On the 18th June, the minister of war, gen. Toral, transmitted to the Mexican chamber of deputies, through their secretaries, a communication, of which the following is a translated copy:—

A presentation. (Initiativa.)

Most excellent sir: It is three months since his excellency, the president ad interim, took the reins of government, with a firm and energetic hand, and be the result of his measures, vigilance and toil, have been, by the favor of Providence, the exterior and interior peace of the republic, and his excellency, who thinks he has done but little for his country, while any thing remains yet to be done, has therefore fixed his views on the "department of Texas," and, in consideration of which, he cannot lose the opportunity to cause it to enter again into the bosom of the great Mexican family. For this object, conforming to the wish of the nation, which is likewise most fervently his own, he is resolved to prepare another expedition, which shall offer to the Texans peace or war, indulgence or punishment.

The nation knows how many toils and sufferings his excellency, the president ad interim, has undergone, when he led the arms of his country to the confines of Texas, though fortune afterwards cruelly and maliciously denied him her favors. It is not to avenger the chains and contumelies which he suffered, nor to silence the calamities which dared to tarnish his name, nor private interest, nor mean resentments, that animates him; his incitements are more noble; he desires to comply with his arduous duty, and to contribute to cause Mexico to be respected, or her interior order, and even more so for the energy with which she sustains her rights when foreign enemies attempt to impair them.

In consequence of which, and in accordance with the council, his excellency commands me to direct to your excellencies the following presentation, (initiativa).

That the executive be empowered to incur the necessary expenses, until the pacification of the "department of Texas" is fully accomplished, and to dictate all measures which may be considered necessary for the attainment of this end!!

I have the honor to make it known to your excellencies, that you may communicate the same to the august chambers, reproducing to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration and esteem. God and liberty!

JOSE MARIA TORNEL.

Mexico, June 18, 1839.
To their excellencies, the secretaries and deputies.
Copy—MEXICO, June 18th, 1839.

NEWS FROM TEXAS. By the arrival in our port of the steam packet Columbia, we have received our correspondence from Galveston to the 28th of June, inclusive:

The advices from Houston state the crops of cotton and corn had a very fine appearance, and promised to be very abundant. A report was in circulation in that city, that the Indians were committing more ravages on the frontier, and preparations were making to put a stop to them. The intelligence was given us by a respectable gentleman, who came a passenger in the Columbia, but our papers say nothing about it.

The Texans did not appear to pay any attention to, or be disturbed by the report of an invasion by the Mexicans.

The Civilian of Galveston says: We briefly noticed in our last number the arrival of the schooner Viper, from Baltimore, which vessel is one of the six contracted for, for the use of our government, and with which our naval force is to be formed. We do not pretend to any knowledge of the qualities of this or any other class of vessels, but to our eyes she seems finely proportioned, and is certainly well and faithfully put up and furnished.

FROM THE PACIFIC. The editors of the New York Express have intelligence from the Pacific, Valparaiso, and Lima, to the 26th April, and Guayaquil to the 21st May.

Gen. Santa Cruz, with his officers, was at Guayaquil 21st May, where they arrived from Isly, in her Britannic majesty's sloop Samarang, a month before having embarked at Isly under an escort of sixty men, the sloop being pursued by the party of general Boliviana.

Generals Goruano and La Fructa were in possession of Peru, and had called a congress to meet in May, for the election of a president. The Chilean troops were mostly in the neighborhood of Lima, waiting for PAY, and if they do not get till they leave it, they will be as grey as badgers before they get it.

Gen. Santa Cruz has published a small pamphlet concerning his resignation as president of Bolivia, and protector of the Peru Bolivian Confederation.

The U. S. sloop-of-war, Lexington and Falmonth, under command of Callao, and Macho. The U. S. brig Boxer, captain Nicholson, sailed same date from Callao, for Matland. The ship Anguile sailed for Valparaiso on the 27th April.

FLOUR TRADE WITH BRAZIL. Respecting the trade in the duty on flour, imported into Brazil, the National Gazette has the following paragraph:—

On the authority of a commercial house, with known means of correct information concerning our trade with Brazil, we stated on the 5th inst. at the request of one of the firm, that American flour would not be subject to increased duties under the new tariff regulations. We are now informed that this statement was erroneous, and we make another at the suggestion of a correspondent. By the latest advices from Brazil, the duty on flour, under the new regulation to go into effect the 1st July, has been varied from 20 per cent. on a valuation of 120,000 per barrel, to 20 per cent. on a valuation to be fixed weekly, which will probably be 200,000, making the duty 40,000 instead of 24,000; being an increase of duty of 1,600, or nearly one dollar per barrel.

On this we may remark, that the vice consul of Brazil, in this city, has a letter from the consul general, at New York, which contains the following sentence, but no mention is made by the writer of the operation of the Brazilian law upon American flour as above stated. We perceive from the Baltimore papers that Captain Clark of the schooner Emily, late from Pernambuco, states that a duty of twenty per cent. is exacted on American flour, so that, when valued at 200,000, the duty will be 40,000 instead of 24,000 as formerly—which corresponds with the information given above.

THE OHIO. No river in the world rolls for a thousand miles a current so smooth and peaceful. Its tributaries wind through as many valleys in ten different states. The Tennessee, the first in size, having passed a navigable course through three states, for more than one thousand miles, falls into the Ohio river fifty miles above its mouth; the Cumberland—sixty-two miles—being navigable for steamboats to Nashville, and for keel boats three hundred miles further, the Wabash, two hundred miles; Green river two hundred and eighty miles from the mouth of the Ohio river—navigable two hundred miles, and two hundred yards wide at the mouth; the Kentucky, five hundred and four miles, navigable one hundred and fifty miles; Great Miami, four hundred and eighty-two miles—navigable sixty-four miles to the Salines, where annually is made from five to seven hundred bushels of salt; Great Muskingum, nine hundred and fifty miles. These are the principal auxiliaries which give substance and strength to the Ohio. In its course of more than a thousand miles, it washes six states, and with its tributaries, has more than five thousand miles of navigable waters. Its mean width is six hundred yards, with the exception of its lowest fifty miles, the average width of which is one thousand yards. The average rapidity of its current is three miles an hour. It rises fifty or more feet. At low water, its surface at Cincinnati is supposed to be one hundred and thirty feet below the level of Lake Erie, and four hundred and thirty above the tide water of the Atlantic. Such is the Ohio.

THE LOGS. The Piscataqui Herald, gives the following account of the state of affairs on the Aroostook, as given by a portion of the posse from that county, who have returned. This account varies considerably from that received from other sources.

The Herald says—"The men under the charge of major Turner, and captain Williamson, of Parkman, to guard the trespass timber cut on the disputed territory, build roads, &c. have all returned; having taken leave sans ceremonie." The reason they give for leaving is, that their provisions were unsuitable, consisting of pork and hard bread only, and that of the very poorest quality; they say that the boom has been open much of the time since the timber commenced running—that it was suffered to remain open by night without being properly guarded, and that rafts of timber were run through, supposed to have been cut by trespassers—that by some unaccountable cause, much of the timber cut by trespassers, found its way out of the boom and was secured below, along the bank of the river, which timber has since disappeared and gone down the stream. The men further state, that there is not one hundred sticks of timber now in the boom; at the time appointed by the land agent for the sale of the trespass timber, there were a number of persons who appeared for the purpose of purchasing, but neither the land agent, or any other person was present to sell."

MILITIA OF PENNSYLVANIA. From the report of the adjutant general, we learn that the army of Pennsylvania is numbered and divided as follows. Considering that we are a free people, we have a pretty large army—on paper.

1 commander-in-chief.
16 major generals—34 brigadiers.
34 brigade inspectors—1 adjutant general.
3 arsenals.
136 regular regiments and five irregular battalions of militia, numbering	175,929
Cavalry,	5,005
Artillery and infantry,	11,957
Riflemen,	14,966—31,534
Grand total of militiamen	207,463

ANTIQUITIES. A few days since, some laborers having occasion to dig in the large mound between this city and Portland, discovered, about three feet under the surface, several graves, about 30 inches in length. Slabs of stone were laid upon the bottom of the graves, two pieces of similar material constituted the sides, and a flag stone the lid or top of a rough sarcophagus. In one of these graves were found near a dozen human skulls, and at least a handful of perfect and beautiful teeth; also, the bones of persons—but these last crumbled into ashes at the touch.

"This is altogether a singular discovery. The gentleman who affords this information is probably the oldest resident in Louisville, and says he well recollects when this mound was covered by a growth of the heaviest poplar. These remains must have been deposited in their narrow cell more than two centuries since. There was a mode of burial among the Choctaws and other tribes, which would lead us to believe that those are Indian remains, deposited according to that custom. When a warrior died among the Choctaws, instead of being committed to the earth immediately, his frame was suspended in the open air, until the flesh dropped from his bones, and the squaws kept vigil by his remains until "the dust returned to dust." Several skeletons were then deposited in one grave. From the fact that many heads were found in this grave at the mound, we presume they must have been buried there by the dusky maidens of the forest in the olden time, in obedience to the customs of their people." (Louisville (Ky.) Gazette.

MR. WEBSTER. The London Morning Herald of June 4th, contains the following letter from the New York correspondent of that paper. It is an eloquent tribute and testimonial to the character of our most distinguished statesman.

New York, May 18, 1839.

A passenger in the steamer this morning is Daniel Webster, a man whose fame may have preceded him to the old world, and justifies me in devoting this letter to a brief sketch of him. He is a member of the senate of the United States. As a jurist and an advocate, he is without a rival in this country. In the higher walks of eloquence, there is no man here who can contest the palm with him. As a constitutional statesman, he is by many considered eminently superior to all his contemporaries.

Mr. Webster is a native of New Hampshire, one of the northern and New England states. He is the son of a farmer. At an early age he displayed superior powers and was sent to a collegiate institution, where he received such an education as is afforded by our seats of learning. On leaving college, he entered on the study of the law, soon became distinguished, and was sent to congress. He subsequently removed to Boston, in Massachusetts, where for many years he devoted himself exclusively to professional pursuits, and attained a distinguished professional reputation. About the year 1820, he again entered congress, as the representative from Boston, and since that time, in the house and senate, has represented his adopted state. Of Mr. Adams' administration he was the most prominent champion and advocate; of gen. Jackson's, from the commencement, he was a uniform opponent. At the presidential contest, he was the candidate of Massachusetts for the chief magistracy of the union.

He visits England as a private citizen. His friends anticipate that he will meet with a favorable reception, and create a strong impression. Of this there is no doubt, if he should have a favorable opportunity of a public display. His appearance is remarkable. He is of a large and firm stature, and with a head that phrenologists will endorse as the seat of a gigantic intellect. His hair and complexion are dark, and his large deep seated black eyes full of expression. In his impassioned moments he reaches an elevation of eloquence far surpassing any thing that I have ever witnessed among his fellow senators and statesmen. His usual manner is calm, collected and dignified. His voice is clear and sonorous. He uses but little gesture, and that of no remarkable grace. His characteristics are vigor, energy, clearness of arrangement, boldness, and directness of logic, with singular simplicity of diction and power of argument.

Mr. Webster is an opponent of the present federal administration—one of its distinguished opponents. His fame is pre-eminence as a constitutional jurist. His arguments before the supreme court of the union are models of style, and text books of instruction. Before a jury he is without a peer. Even his political enemies admit that in this arena he is a giant. His legal knowledge is extensive. At some periods of his life he has been a laborious student, and of the common and statute law of England he is a perfect master. His literary information is far superior to that of most of our public men—but it is chiefly in the literature of England that he is critically versed. He has studied Shakespear more assiduously than Homer—Dante more faithfully than Demosthenes. In the political history of Great Britain he is thoroughly educated, and I imagine that but few of your own statesmen are more familiar than he with the great questions that have agitated your country since the commencement of the present century.

In the character of his mind he approaches more nearly to lord Brougham than to any other of your living public men. In general erudition he is his lordship's inferior, in legal acquisition his equal. As a terse and accurate writer of the English language, he will compare not unfavorably with lord Brougham; and as an orator, speaking with my country's partiality, I should place him somewhat in a higher position. In natural powers of mind he is the rival of any man living, and I know not where to look in the catalogue of illustrious dead, of any age or nation, for his superior.

The description which I have here given, you will consider tinged with national partialities, and will hardly know to what credit it is fairly entitled. I do not give it to you as my opinion merely. As far as it touches Mr. Webster's intellectual character, I may safely say that it is the opinion of the nation. America never sent to Europe a man of whose endowments she is so proud. No man ever left our shores bearing with him such universal reputation in his own country; a reputation which few deny, because there is no one to rival or share in it. As a man, as an orator, as a politician, as a statesman, Mr. Webster is not so popular as Mr. Clay. He has not so many of the qualities which attract and fix merely popular admiration. But his intellect is of a higher order.—His reputation as a constitutional jurist rests on a more permanent basis.

Mr. Webster will remain a few months in England, returning, probably, to resume his duties in the senate early in December. A nation commends to the kind regards of her parent nation one of her most distinguished children, and would bespeak for him those courtesies which genius and intellect should always command, and which, we feel assured, that Englishmen will not be backward to bestow.

GEN. SCOTT. This gallant soldier arrived at Chicago on the 6th inst. in the steambot Illinois. He came from the Chicago American, that he is bound for Fort Winnebago, with a view to quell the hostile spirit manifested by the Indians.

WOOL. We have noticed with regret a week or two past, indications of a decline of prices in this article,—we said with regret, for we are desirous that the farmer who toils in the cold of the winter and in the heat of summer, should reap a rich reward for their industry. The alleged reasons for this decline are said to grow out of circumstances connected with manufacturing. The wool manufacturers last year say they have lost money in the business or have failed to make any profit, and in many instances they have barely paid the expenses of their establishments, and several are changing their machinery from the manufacture of wools to the manufacture of cotton goods. These statements tend to depress the prices, and they will do it if they are honestly made. But let the farmer note the other circumstance, the country is full of agents for the purchase of wool. This looks favorable. In several of the best wool growing towns in New Hampshire, there exists considerable competition among the agents of the manufacturers, to secure the refusal of the best lots, but the owners are not anxious to sell at the prices offered, which range from 50 to 55 cts. for the best full blood, and occasionally for an extraordinary lot, a little higher. An intelligent wool dealer at Lebanon—one of the first wool growing towns in New England—a few days since informed us that there existed a general disposition among the farmers in L. to hold on to their wool at present, yet there were some among them who sold as low as 50 cents per pound. An extraordinary good lot, we were told was sold at Boscawen at 60 cents. Our farmer friends may judge from these facts of their prospects at present of disposing of their wool. There will doubtless be changes in prices during the two or three following months. The manner in which lots of wool have been cleansed and done up, will regulate to some extent its value. Buyers look to this as of more importance than they formerly have done.

NEW YORK AND ERIE RAIL ROAD CONVENTION AT ITHACA. A convention of delegates from the several counties interested in the New York and Erie rail road, assembled at Ithaca, July 11, 1839. George W. Pattison, of Livingston, was chosen president, and David M. Wescott, of Orange; G. H. Barstow, of Tioga; John I. Labagh, of New York; Richard Wright, of Cattaraugus; James Robinson, of —; Edward Howell, of Steuben, vice presidents. B. J. Seward, of Chataque; J. G. Clinton, of Orange, secretaries.

A letter from governor Seward, was read, expressing a decided opinion in favor of "the immediate accomplishment of the great improvement." A series of resolutions was reported and unanimously adopted, in favor of the immediate construction of the road as a state work, and advising such organization in the several counties, as in no case to submit the support for office, of any candidate, of sentiments doubtful or hostile.

There was some 300 delegates assembled from the counties of New York, Rockland, Dutchess, Orange, Sullivan, Ulster, Delaware, Cheungo, Cortland, Tompkins, Broome, Tioga, Seneca, Cheungo, Yates, Steuben, Alleghany, Livingston, Oswego, Green, Chautauque, Cattaraugus, Cayuga and Oneida. After completing their proceedings, and ordering them to be published, the convention adjourned on the 12th. [N. Y. American.]

ANECDOTE OF THE REVOLUTION. At the celebration of the 4th at Hartford, the following toast was given:

By the hon. Joseph Trumbull. A delegate in congress from Connecticut, after having signed his name to the Declaration of Independence, said to one of his companions: If we are defeated in our struggle for independence, this day's work will make bad work for me. I have held a commission in the rebel army; I have written for the rebel newspapers; I am the son-in-law of a rebel governor; and now I have affixed my name to this rebel declaration. My sins are therefore too great to be pardoned by our royal master, and I must then be hanged.

The other gentleman answered: I believe my case is not so desperate, for I have had no connection with the army; nor can it be proved that heretofore I have written, or done any thing very obnoxious to the molier country.

The immediate and prompt reply was: "Then, sir, you deserve to be hanged."

The memory of col. William Williams, a patriot of '76—who that he might aid in removing the halter from his country's neck, never hesitated to expose his own.

Revolutionary times.—The following toast was given at a celebration of the 4th at Portland:

Time that tried men's souls—A poll tax of eight silver dollars, and a family suffering for bread.

N. B. This was in the year 1780, when large sums were called for to supply the continental army; and to give some idea of the times, it may be well to state, that the best men could get but $6 per month on farms.

THE BOUNDARY. The following is an extract from a London letter in the Quebec Gazette, dated June 12—

"I think you may take it as certain, that a special convention has either left this country, or will speedily be sent to America, for arranging the basis of a settlement of the disputes with the government of the United States, relative to the boundary question.

"Her majesty's advocate, sir John Dodson, has, for sometime, been engaged in drawing up this convention, which, I am told, is in strict conformity with the instructions sent to the American minister at our court. The other mentioned facts I am not at liberty, at present, to communicate. But I think the knotty point is in a fair way of arrangement.

CEDAR QUARRIES.—"On asking a friend from Oswego the other day, who used this term, what it meant, he informed us that much of the cedar which comes from lake Ontario, is absolutely dug out of the soil. On some of the islands of that lake, which furnish great quantities of that valuable timber, there has not been growing a single tree for many years. Generation has apparently succeeded generation of this timber, had fallen, and been successfully covered with earth, and is now dug out for rail roads, fence posts, &c. in perfectly sound state."

The above is from the Cultivator. Persons who have been on the islands have stated to us similar facts. We believe, however, the quarries are getting exhausted of their most valuable mineral—the red cedar, or that it is so deeply imbedded, that the labor of excavation is not sufficiently rewarded. During this season nearly all the cedar importations have been of the white species. We have heard it stated that some of the islands—the Ducks and Pigeons for instance, at the northeastern termination of the lake—there are subterranean passages pervading their whole area. That the roof, or exterior surface seems to be composed of agglomerated earth matted and held together by the roots of trees which rest upon it and have covered it with a thick growth of timber. The vaulted passages, or deep hollows, are filled with cedar logs lying in every variety of position and which no doubt, formerly like the rafters of a house gave support to the superincumbent mass. From the accounts we have had, there are more wonderful labyrinth constructed by nature on lake Ontario, than that of old upon the banks of lake Meris. [Oswego Pal.]

A GREAT ALLIGATOR HUNT. A few days since captain Patterson, of Pattersonville, Dutch settlement, in company with three friends, captain Covell and Messrs. Charles Bryan and R. S. Beesley, started out on a regular alligator hunt in the neighborhood of Bayou Chere Amie and Glass Lake. For some time past the alligators in that section have committed many depredations upon the deer and dogs, "lying in wait," at the narrower and more frequented parts of the byways and nabbing any strange cur or deer which might chance to win across. To thin off those depredators the hunt was got up, and it proved highly successful. The party was out but two days and a half, and in that time they shot no less than six hundred and fifty-seven of the largest kind, not wasting a bit of powder upon any one unless he measured good a feel in length. This we consider the height of sport. Our informant, Mr. Beesley, who was one of the party, gave us a glowing description of the sport. From the manner in which he speaks of it, deer and buffalo hunting is not a circumstance there is but one vulnerable point about an alligator, the eye, and the antics they cut up when some unlucky bullet finds an inlet to the brain, rough that small opening are said to be amusing to the extreme.

The party carried on the work of destruction until they were entirely out of balls. Had their ammunition held out there is no knowing how many of these varnints would have been destroyed. [N. O. Pic.]

IMPORTANT DECISION. We copy from the Boston Advertiser, the following report of a case tried at the U. States circuit court on Saturday: The case of Isaac Grant and others vs. Mark early was an action brought to recover a balance accounts. The plaintiffs are merchants at Trieste, Austria. In December 1836, the plaintiffs' agent this city, Mr. Trueman, advanced to the defendant $4,565 by a bill drawn on Baring, Brother & Co. In consideration of this, the defendant agreed to ship, and did ship a cargo of sugars, consigned to the plaintiffs for sale. The vessel sailed on the voyage, and at the time of her arrival at Trieste, in the month of 1837, the market for this kind of sugars as exceedingly depressed in consequence of changes in the Austrian tariff of duties and embarrasment of the money market in Europe. The sugars were sold in April 1837, at a price less than half their invoice value.

In consequence of these disastrous sales, the nett proceeds fell short of the advance money. This it was brought for the balance. The parties agreed that if the jury found for the plaintiffs, the amount should be agreed, or be ascertained by an assessor. The jury found for the plaintiffs, and the parties agreed as to the amount, except as to a sine item; and that was whether the defendant could be charged according to the par of exchange the actual rate of exchange between Buson and Trieste at the time of the verdict.

Judge Story said the general doctrine was clear, at wherever a debt is made payable in one country, and it is afterwards sued for in another country, the creditor is entitled to receive the full sum necessary to replace the money in the country where it ought to have been paid, with interest for the delay. In the present case he thought that the advances having been made in Massachusetts, if the bills sent to Trieste did not fully reimburse the amount, the balance was properly due and payable in Massachusetts. Consequently the plaintiffs were entitled only to the balance due at the par of exchange.

THE LOWELL FACTORIES. A correspondent of the Boston Traveller, from Lowell, gave, some time since, the following account of it. If the amount of business strikes the reader with surprise, the ample means for religious and moral instruction will be peculiarly gratifying. The amount of capital invested in the manufactures is $7,650,000; viz in the locks and canals company, $600,000; in the Merrimack, $1,500,000; the Appleton, $590,000; in the Lowell, 500,000 dollars; in the Suffolk, $450,000; in the Fremont, $300,000; in the Lawrence, $1,200,000; in the Middlesex, $590,000; in the Boutt cotton mill, 1,000,000. There are 27 mills, exclusive of the mill works, comprising 129,523 spindles, 4,197 looms, employing 5,416 female operatives, and 377 males.

Each week 283,000 pounds, or 732 bales of cotton are wrought into cloth. Eight hundred and forty-nine thousand yards of cloth are manufactured per week, including broadcloths, cassimeres, carpets, rugs, &c. A pound of cotton averages two and two-tenths yards. One hundred pounds of cotton produce eighty-nine pounds of cloth. In addition to the above establishments, there are the annel mill, the Lowell bleachery, the powder mills, the card and whip factory, the planing machine, the reed machine, the grist and saw mills, and in the vicinity the glass works and furnace. The locks and canals machine shop, from the extent, variety, and beauty of its mechanical operations, presents to the spectator's eye some of the most interesting and wonderful exhibitions of the place.

A highly commendable interest is taken by the overseers and operatives in intellectual and moral improvement. The Mechanics' Institute has a large and fine edifice, containing a spacious reading room, library, mineralogical cabinet, lecture room, &c. and on a liberal scale, admirably arranged and supervised. The lyceum sustains annually a course of able lectures, sparing neither pains nor expense to render them of the highest intellectual order. There are in Lowell thirteen religious societies—three orthodox congregational, two baptist, two methodist, one episcopalian, one unitarian, one free-will baptist, two universalist, and one catholic. Few places of the size have been so highly favored with able and successful Christian ministers and pastors.

ILLINOIS RAIL ROADS. A public meeting was to be held at Peoria, on the 29th ult., on the subject of internal improvements. The Peoria Register of that date, gives the following statements—the first showing the total length of each rail road projected in the state, and the aggregate length of all the rail roads:

Central rail road	457 1/2
Southern cross rail road	291
Northern cross rail road	231 1/2
Shelbyville and Paris branch Central rail road	71 1/2
Peoria and Warsaw rail road	116
Alton and Shelbyville rail road	71
Belleville and Lebanon rail road	23 3/4
Bloomington, Mackinaw, Peoria and Pekin rail road	53 3/4

Total length of all the roads in the state, 1,341 3/4.

The following table shows the average cost per mile, the total cost of each and of all the said roads, and the amount expended to the end of last year:

Names of roads.	Cost per mile.	Total.	Am't exp.
Central rail road	$8,336	$3,809,145	$145,765
S. cross and Alton and Shawncetown R. R.	8,200	2,410,800	42,763
Northern cross R. R.	8,400	1,976,335	515,311
Shelbyville and Paris rail road	10,593	757,113	51,203
Peoria and Warsaw rail road	9,351	966,396	75,255
Alton and Shelbyville rail road	8,295	754,845	5,200
Belleville and Lebanon	7,000	164,500	371
Bloomington, Mackinaw, Peoria and Pekin rail road	11,736	630,810	38,022

Total cost of the above roads, $41,470,444 $728,125

THE GREAT RAIL ROAD. The Charleston Courier, of the 12th instant, contains a communication from general Hayne, president of the South Carolina rail road company, in which he contradicts the statement, lately current, that the intention of carrying the road beyond Columbia has been abandoned. The following concluding portion of the statement presents a very interesting view of the operations of the company:—

"To sum up, in a few words, the present condition, policy and prospects of the company, we would state that we have purchased, and almost reconstructed, a road 136 miles long; connecting us with all the improvements going on in Georgia, Alabama, and the whole southwest, on which two-thirds of the purchase money (amounting, with the repairs, to near $2,000,000) had been already paid. We have laid out the road to Columbia, a distance of 128 miles; in the graduation of which great progress has been made, and which is now going on rapidly. We have surveyed, by several routes, the entire line from Charleston to Lexington. We have established a rail road bank, with a capital which now amounts to a million and a half of dollars, and whose profits, for the last six months, have been at the rate of eight per cent. per annum; and we hope so to regulate our measures, hereafter, as to extend our road, step by step, bringing into use successive sections, from time to time; and, while these operations are going on, to be able, from the profits of the road and the bank, to afford reasonable dividends to our stockholders on the whole amount of their investments. To accomplish all this, it is believed that nothing is necessary but the continued cordial and zealous support of the stockholders and the country. I will only add, for general information, that the next instalment of $5 on each share will not be called for before the 20th of October next. Believing that the information I have thus attempted to afford would be acceptable to the public, I avail myself of the occasion to lay it before them."

REAPING MACHINE. The Frederick Herald states that many persons in that quarter who feel an interest in agricultural improvements, have been out to witness the operation of the new cutting machine, which has been in use the present harvest on the farm of Mr. Slater, near the city—so that they might judge for themselves of its availability in expediting the important work of ingathering the harvest. As the result of this ocular test of its powers, the Herald states that while some are sceptical, as yet, a large majority of those who have seen the machine in operation, concur in opinion that it effects a great saving of labor, and that, at least in plain and even ground, and where the grain is not down, it may be used to great advantage. This paper gives the following short description of this new invention: "The machine, which does not occupy as much space as a common cart, is drawn by two horses, and the double edged knives in the shape of a M M A, in the angles of which the grain is caught, and by the slight vibratory motion against fixed straight prongs, is cut, like as if in the grasp of a pair of shears, is fixed along the exterior of the cart as it were by its wheels. The machine tended by a driver and a single rake, is said to cut 15 [say ten, rather], acres per day, and of course will give busy employment to a number of binders.— While we witnessed its operations, it seemed to perform admirably well, but to labor under some disadvantages which longer experience may correct."

TEAS. The Canton Price Current of the 5th March, publishes the statement of the General Chamber of Commerce, showing the exportation of teas to the United States for the season of 1838 '39, ending Feb. 26th. The following are the totals:

	Peculs.	Chests.
Black teas,	4,379	9,556
Green teas,	32,284	47,650

These teas were shipped on board of thirteen vessels, all of which were bound for New York, with the exception of one, the Commerce, for Philadelphia. This ship had on board 457 peculs of black, and 2,826 peculs of green tea.

THE STEAM FRIGATES. The secretary of the navy has written the annexed letter to Chas. J. Ingersoll, esq. of Philadelphia, in answer to one inquiring of him whether it was true, as reported, that the engines of the steam frigate on the stocks at Philadelphia, were contracted for out of that city; and suggesting the propriety of issuing proposals for competition.

Washington, 29th June, 1839.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter, I beg leave to assure you there is no intention on my part to slight the mechanics of Philadelphia, of whose character and skill I am fully aware. It has always been my intention to have the engines of the steam frigate to be built at Philadelphia, constructed there, provided there be any establishment in the city competent to that purpose, and willing to accede to the terms on which these for the frigate will be completed. You may not be aware, however, that a trip hammer, of five or six tons, is indispensable to the proper amalgamation of the large pieces of wrought iron, and the wrought iron wheels, which make part of these engines, and which must be made elsewhere, unless these hammers are provided. I do not know whether any establishment in Philadelphia is furnished with these, as I have not had any direct application from your city.

There is no intention of issuing public invitations for offers, and, according to custom, accepting the lowest. The object is of too great magnitude to risk its success on defective engines, and the course intended to be pursued, is to ascertain, as may be done, the fair price for first rate and complete machinery, and pay that price when the work is satisfactorily performed. I think it will be worth while for some one of your great establishments to set about erecting the necessary machinery for these works, which I understand will take six months, or perhaps more. When the proper period arrives, measures will be taken to engage the engines, and to ascertain the terms on which they can be had in Philadelphia, as well as the capacity of the manufacturers to execute them properly.

I am, dear sir, with great respect and regard, your friend and servant, J. K. PAULDING.

CONVICTION FOR LIBEL. The editor and proprietor of a paper called the Buffalonian, published at Buffalo, New York, has been convicted of a libel upon Mr. Stow, a lawyer, and sentenced to imprisonment for four months, and to pay a fine of §150. Other indictments for similar offences are pending against him.

In pronouncing the sentence of the court, the presiding judge said:

"In the punishment of an editor or proprietor of a paper for a libellous publication, where the attack is wanton and without justification, we aim no blow at the liberty of the press. It does not belong to the genius of our institutions to abridge that liberty. The shield which the constitution interposes for its protection is ample and sufficient; and the press has no restraints upon it but such as the peace and safety of the community demand. Thus free, it is a mighty engine and, when well directed is a blessing. It corrects error, promotes whatever reforms and elevates our nature, inculcates a respect for the laws, and protects every interest dear to a free people.

"But a licentious press is the very opposite. It is an abuse of the freedom secured by the constitution, and is a curse instead of a blessing. It recognises no limits, and is reckless of consequences. It strikes at the innocent as well as the guilty, poisons the public mind, maliciously and wantonly blackens reputation, invades the sanctity of domestic life, ruins the hope of happiness of families, and disturbs the peace of the community, setting the laws and those who administer them at defiance. To which of these objects, whether to a well directed or a licentious press, you have devoted your talents and attention, your own conscience will inform you. Certain it is that you have been convicted of one gross violation of the law. Another indictment remains against you in this court, containing charges similar to those upon which you have just been tried. Our records also exhibit evidences of breaches of the public peace, produced by the inflammatory publication of your paper.

"This court has no feeling to gratify in your punishment. It is always painful to us to inflict pain on any individual. But in this instance, as well as in all others, however unpleasant the duty, it must be faithfully discharged.

"To the tribunals of the country the people look for a just and fearless administration of the laws. Whenever courts and juries shall falter in the execution of the high trusts committed to them we may expect the loss of public virtue, the abuse of liberty, open and shameless attempts to subvert the wholesome order of society, and, in the end, the prostration of our best institutions. It is our intention to avoid any such consequences, as far as a strict discharge of duty on our part can avail.

"We see in you a violator of the peace, the malignant asperser of a respectable and good citizen. We conceive ourselves bound to hold you up as an example to others, and by the sentence we shall pass, to admonish you and others that all similar and future infractions of the law will be visited by this court with a punishment amply sufficient to correct the evil complained of."

DAMES, CURRENCY, &c. Vicksburg bank. Yesterday noon, agreeably to public notice, the stockholders of the Vicksburg bank in this city, assembled in a room of the Merchants' Exchange.

J. W. Perot, esq. was called to the chair, and W. A. Dobbyn, esq. appointed secretary.

Messrs. A. W. Mitchell, and S. E. Carpenter, commissioners appointed to hold you up as an example to others, and by the sentence we shall pass, to admonish you and others that all similar and future infractions of the law will be visited by this court with a punishment amply sufficient to correct the evil complained of."

Great interest was felt as to the result of the labors of the commissioners, and a verbal report which was so luminous and manly, entering into details, may be regarded, on the whole, as favorable. We are not able to give the particulars, but the commissioners mentioned a strong probability that the ultimate loss on the capital stock would not exceed fourteen per cent. They report that the securities seem to be of a good character.

That the road may be considered as a valuable and profitable part of the concern.

That though many irregularities had found their way into the business proceedings of the bank, during the absence, (on England we believe), of Mr. Robbins, the present cashier, yet it is confidently believed, that under his immediate superintendence, which will be beneficial constantly, every act will be in conformity with established bank usage.

That there needed in the institution the services of an efficient financier, as president.

In the course of the report, a belief is expressed that the bank could be immediately reconstituted, with very small pecuniary aid, for a profitable exchange business. We cannot vouch for the exactness of our statement, as it was gathered somewhat desultorily, but it is mainly correct. [U. S. Gazette.]

Philadelphia money market. The United States Gazette of Monday has the following paragraph:

Money and stocks. There is a depression in stocks evident in the prices obtained on Saturday, a depression of course consequent on the scarcity of money. Business has for some weeks past been dull, very dull, though not unusually dull for the season; a natural consequence of this is a want of activity in the money channels, it does not pass from hand to hand paying debts, and leaving a profit—but this cause, so far as it is operative, must soon cease. Again the dividends on bank and insurance stock declared early this month, had not on Saturday been paid; these became due about this week, and will go towards easing the difficulties. While we see that there is straits in the money market, we do not see it so generally operative, nor so unconquerable as others do. With the renewal of business now at hand, we may look for an important amelioration. That abundance of money which once distinguished our business warts will not, perhaps, very soon return.

The North American of Monday says—
The week has closed with a greater depression in the stock market than any which has occurred for a long time past in the more firm descriptions of stocks. U. S. bank which is much wanted for remittance is very firm and has advanced from 1-24 to 1 cent. Vicksburg is about the same, but in all other kinds there has been a decided decline.

The best commercial paper is going freely at 1-14 per cent. a month, and very excellent paper is done at 1-12. A large amount of that afloat is negotiated for the account of New York houses, who are constantly pressing large amounts upon the market. Our banks have contracted their issues to almost their specie basis. The news by the Sidons is only a day later, and that they are to reappear, and the reform definite was received by law, for although the transactions both in cotton and money of the day preceing her sailing bore a sinister aspect, they cannot be regarded as indicative of any thing positive.

Under date of Saturday, 2 P. M. the New York Express says—

The advance in exchange on England to 110 per cent. and the rate asked by the U. S. States bank, has caused some apprehension. The arrival within a few days of a large amount of British goods, has impressed the public with the idea that the orders for goods are larger than was supposed. Under these circumstances it would not be surprising if specie should be required to be shipped. It should be kept in mind, however, that there is yet about seventy thousand bales of cotton in this market, nearly all of which is to be laid down in Europe. This of itself is worth over four millions of dollars, and as this is but a portion of the crop remaining, there must be a good deal of exchange to be drawn for.

The New York Express of Monday, 2 P. M. says—
The rate of Exchange on London is 110, and on Paris 4.89.

The bank of the United States at Philadelphia, has issued a circular calling in 20 per cent. every 60 days on stock and accommodation loans.

The British Queen is not telegraphed, and there seems to be a very strong belief, without much authority, however, that her day of sailing was put off. All interested in money matters await her arrival with the greatest anxiety.

From the Philadelphia North American of Tuesday.

The stock market has been excessively languid to-day, with the exception of U. S. bank which was very firm at 114. After the 2d board, the following sales of Vicksburg were made—50 at 38 3/4, 200 at 38 1-2 10 days, and 50 at 38 1-4 a 38 1-2, 8 days, closing offered freely at 38.

The money market continues without any alleviation.

We learn that gen. Tilson, one of the commissioners of loans for the state of Illinois, has been in this city endeavoring to negotiate a further sale of bonds on the part of the state; he has been unable to effect any thing from the deranged state of our money market. The high standing of gen. Tilson at home would be a sufficient guarantee to effect a sale, had such a thing been the present practice, in the market.

Domestic exchanges. The rates between New York and other places are thus quoted in the Express of Saturday:

	Bank notes.
New England,	1-2
New York country,	1-2
Philadelphia,	1-4 dis.
Baltimore,	1-2 do.

The law prohibiting the banks of Ohio from issuing or paying out notes of a less amount than three dollars, took effect on the 4th inst. The same law also prohibits the issuing of notes of a less sum than $5, after the 1st of October.

The bank of Illinois at Shawneetown has declared a dividend of one cent per cent. for the six months ending on the 30th of June last, and payable on the 1st of July.

Bank of Charleston. We have received a copy in pamphlet form, of the annual report of the president of this flourishing institution. It has paid semi-annual dividends of 10 per cent. on the capital stock ever since it has been in operation, and has surplus or reserve profits of an amount, for the six months ending on the 30th of June last, of $516,762 33, and its balances, 200 against other city banks amount to $360,552 48, being $115,488 81 beyond its circulation; and its resources in foreign and domestic exchange and in open credits in Europe, amount in the aggregate to $2,423,248 66. The foreign and domestic exchange due and running to maturity, far exceeds its deposits. Entire confidence is expressed that the bank, with its capital extended to four millions of dollars, will be enabled in all time to come, to declare from its profits dividends equal to those of other institutions with smaller capitals. The remaining installment of one million of dollars will be called for on or before the 1st of August, and will amount to $2,060,111 78. The bank of Missouri has, after retaining a sufficient sum as a contingent fund, declared a dividend of seven per cent. for the last six months upon the stock paid in. This is more than any bank in the union, that we remember of, has ever done.

[St. Louis Republic.]
The New York Commercial Advertiser Standard states that arrangements are in negotiation by a committee from the western country banks, to continue the reception of their notes at the banks in the city of New York, upon the same terms as formerly. The country free banks have a committee now in the city of New York, who also are making arrangements for the reception of their notes.

Stock sales. From a statement of the U. S. States Commercial and Statistical Register, published at Philadelphia, that the aggregate amount of stocks sold at the brokers' board in N. York during the month of June, was $3,654,460 53; averaging $147,373 42 per day. In Philadelphia, $701,476 43; averaging $28,059 06 per day.

This calculation (says the Journal of Commerce), that the commissions paid to brokers for selling certain stocks, say the Delaware and Hudson, have amounted in the course of a few years, to more than the value of the stock itself.

From the Natchez Courier of the 6th, we learn that the institution is now redeeming its six months notes with specie. These notes will not fall due until after the middle of August, but if any of the holders, are anxious for the specie, they can get it without waiting.

Bank of the Valley. The stockholders of this institution at their meeting on Wednesday last, decided in favor of accepting the provisions of the acts of 1837 and 1838, increasing the banking capital, by a vote of 739 for, to 400 against.

They also, we learn, adopted a resolution instructing the board of directors of the mother bank, to present a memorial to the next legislature, praying a modification of the said acts, some of the provisions of which are onerous to the bank, and inconvenient and injurious to the community.

[Wilmington Republican.] The amount of specie imported into the United States during the year ending 20th September last, was $17,747,116, viz: gold bullion $2,200,649; silver bullion, $392,843; gold coin, $1,144,149; silver coin, $5,679,300. The amount of specie imported in the previous year was $10,506,414. In 1836 $13,400,751. In 1835 $12,400,591. In 1834 $17,911,639. In 1833 $4,129,673.

In the last five years, (remarks the Journal of Commerce), the aggregate amount of specie imported into this country, is over $77,000,000, besides what has been brought in by emigrants. Within the same period $27,000,000 perhaps have been exported. Leaving a balance of $50,000,000 in favor of the United States, averaging $10,000,000 per year. And yet if a few cents of specie leave us, we have the fidgets at once!

The Farmers' and Mechanics' bank of Georgetown Washington, D. C. has declared a dividend of one dollar per share, equal to four per cent. for the last six months; and the Potomac Insurance company of Georgetown, a dividend of twenty per cent. on the amount of stock, at the amount of capital paid-in—five tenths of which is carried to the credit of the surplus fund.

The Philadelphia North American of Thursday says:

There is no material change to note in the stock and money market. The former, with the exception of Vicksburg, which was offered at 57 1-2, was a shade better than yesterday. In the latter no change.

DESTRUCTIVE HAIL STORM. The Rochester Democrats state, that more than one thousand acres of wheat, which if they had fully ripened, would have yielded more than 20,000 bushels, were destroyed by a hail storm last Sunday. The storm extended east as far as Wayne county, and after it had passed over, the hail lay upon the ground to the depth of four inches. The meadow land also sustained serious injury.

THE FRENCH FRIGATE NEREIDE. The Pennsylvanian Gazette, of the 6th instant, mentions the sailing, from that port for France, of the frigate Nereide, with admiral Baudin on board; and also the sailing of one of the two French brigs of war, for the same destination. We regret to see by the annexed article, from the same paper, that something unpleasant had occurred between the admiral and commodore Shubrick.

We understand that their departure was hastened by the unpleasant relations existing between admiral Baudin and the commander of the U. S. squadron, growing out of some supposed want of professional courtesy on the part of the former. We give these things as we get them, and do not undertake to vouch for their truth; but it is understood, on shore, that com. Shubrick, on the arrival of the admiral, visited him on board his ship, but was not received with the naval honors which he deemed to be due to his rank—that admiral Baudin afterwards addressed a note to the commodore, in which he deprecated any unpleasant feelings which he supposed might, without explanation, be produced by the course of conduct which he had thought it his duty to pursue. We hear several stories as to the manner in which this communication was received—some of them reasonable enough, and some of them not particularly reasonable. Certain it is, however, that little or none of the courtesy interchanged between our officers and the French when they met here, was observable during the late visit of the French squadron; though, personally, we understand, the two commanders were very civil to each other.

The whole difficulty was, we suppose, grown out of the fact that the usages of nations do not permit a French vice admiral to regard an American post captain as his equal in rank, even though they both have the same command. It is a matter for congress to look to; and, if they deem it of sufficient importance, to regulate. We may think as we please about the matter—we may insist as we please upon the commanders of our fleets being entitled to the same honors that would be due to the admirals of other nations—they will not be paid; it is calling "spirits from the vasty deep." With military and naval men, forms are substance, and names are things. We may be a law unto ourselves, but we cannot make law for others; and it is the part of wisdom to follow where we cannot lead.

On the day on which the French squadron dropped down, a dinner was given by commander McIntosh to the admiral and his officers; and, on the day following, the officers of the yard dined on board the French frigate. The admiral toasted "the president of the United States," and at the same time rose and touched a bell, which caused a salute to be fired of 21 guns. In reply to this compliment, capt. McIntosh drank to the "king of the French," and the sentiment was followed by 21 guns from the yard.

On the 4th, the vessels of the French squadron were dressed in admirable and picturesque style, in honor of the day. At sunrise, at meridian and at sundown, each of the French ships fired a national salute of 26 guns.

Of the nine sick sailors sent from the Neriede to the naval hospital at Pensacola, two have died, and the rest are convalescent.

LATEST FROM VERA CRUZ. The Journal of Commerce says: We are indebted to capt. Kingsbury, of the brig Caspar Hauser, for a file of Vera Cruz papers to the 18th June.

The U. S. frigate Constitution, with Mr. Ellis, our minister on board, arrived from New York on the 16th.

Tuspan has capitulated to the government forces, according to a communication in the Diario del Gobierno. The insurrection appears to be nearly at an end.

The ceremony of conferring upon gen. Santa Ana the decorations of honor voted by congress for having repulsed the French forces which invaded Vera Cruz on the 5th December, took place in the city of Mexico on the 9th of June.

A BLOODY BATTLE—TWO THOUSAND MEN KILLED.

Buenos Ayres papers to May 11th, received by the editors of the New York Journal of Commerce, via Boston, bring the particulars of a bloody battle which took place on the 31st of March, at a place called Pago Largo, between the army of Corrientes, (one of the provinces of the republic of Rio de la Plata), and the troops of Entre Rios, (another of said provinces), which the Corrientians, in connection with the Oriental republic, (of which Monte Video is the capital), were attempting to revolutionize.

It will be recollected that not many months since, gen. Fructuoso Rivera, or Frutos, as he is familiarly called, raised an insurrection in the Oriental republic, and succeeded in ousting gen. Oribe from the presidential chair, which Rivera of course immediately ascended, adopting such forms of procedure as would best save appearances. Oribe, with a number of his friends, escaped to Buenos Ayres, and awakened in the capital so much interest in his own behalf and in opposition to Rivera, that the latter determined on revenge, and accordingly issued a declaration of war against the United Provinces.

In this he was encouraged by the French authorities at Monte Video, who were in hopes the movement would result in the downfall of Rosas, (governor of Buenos Ayres, and therefore ex-officio conductor of the foreign operations of the United Provinces). This hope was strengthened when, soon after, means were found to gain the co-operation of the province of Corrientes, through the influence of its governor, gen. Astrada. So here were the Oriental republic and the province of Corrientes, encouraged by the French authorities at Monte Video, about to make war upon the United Provinces. And for convenience sake they directed their first operations against the province of Entre Rios. The rest is sufficiently told in the annexed extracts:

Buenos Ayres, May 4. The official details of the battle of Pago Largo, are published in the Gaceta Mercantil, in a despatch from gen. Pascual Echague to H. E. the governor of Buenos Ayres, dated head quarters, Curusacatia, 5th ult. It states that the army of Corrientes, in number more than five thousand men, including 450 infantry and artillery, with three 4 pounders, occupied an advantageous position. The right wing of the army of Entre Rios was commanded by gen. Justo Jose Urquiza, the centre by gen. Servando Gomez, and the left under the immediate orders of the commander-in-chief, general Echague. The Entre Rios cavalry charged that of Corrientes with such impetuosity, that the latter was speedily thrown into disorder, and put down in all directions, whilst the infantry of Entre Rios, consisting of 360 men, with two 2 pounders, killed or took prisoners all the infantry of their opponents, and captured the three pieces of cannon above mentioned. The reserve of the Entre Rios army took no part in the action; its assistance not being necessary. The Corrientes left on the field of battle 1,960 men killed, including 84 officers, as also General Beron de Astrada, governor and captain general of the province of Corrientes, and commander-in-chief of its army. 450 prisoners, 500 muskets, 1,500 lances, 360 carbines, nearly equal number of swords, 6 wagons of ammunition, more than 4,000 horses, a standard, the baggage, correspondence, &c. fell into the hands of the victors.

The despatch concludes as follows—

"Our loss in the glorious victory over the rebel army consists of 5 officers killed, 8 wounded, 50 soldiers killed and 96 wounded."

Buenos Ayres, May 11. The legislature of Corrientes has reversed all the enactments made under baron de Astrada's administration, both as regards the alliance with Don Fructuoso Rivera (president of the Banda Oriental republic), and concession to the French; and declared the firm determination of their constituents to stand by their countrymen in the struggle for national independence. It now appears in the most unquestionable manner that, not only the legislature and the people, but even a great portion of the army were opposed to the proceedings of the late governor, and that measures were in progress for removing him from the command, when he precipitated the action which had such a decisive issue. Amongst the officers killed, there were many pledged to promote the contemplated change, and amongst them colonel Rolon. It is stated that the new governor of Corrientes will be colonel Jose Antonio Romero, with Dr. Theodoro Gauna for his minister. Such an election, it appears, would meet the approbation of the other governments of the confederation.

FOREIGN NEWS.

By the packet ship Siddons, capt. Britton, which left Liverpool the 14th of June, we have one day later than by the Liverpool steam ship.

British Parliament.—An immense number of petitions against, and some for, the national plan of education, were presented to the commons on the night of June 12th. The resolution to continue the sugar duties was adopted. The chancellor of the exchequer said at this time in reference to Brazil, which had become little better than a slave mart, it was highly impolitic to encourage the same by taking off the duties. Mr. Thornley thought this objection idle when Great Britain was so dependent on the cotton and tobacco which are the produce of American slaves.

Spain.—Gen. Agerbe's despatch of May 23d, gives an account of the defeat of the Carlists at Utrillos. The government had published an order enforcing the strictest order at the coming elections. The Carlists near St. Sebastian are deserting in great numbers.

Important from Turkey.—The war between Turkey and Egypt is on the point of commencing. The Turkish army, 60,000 strong, have crossed the Euphrates at Bir.

The greatest consternation prevails in Egypt. The troops of the dey have passed on through Alexandria by forced marches, to join Ibrahim Pacha who with his generals and army are at Aleppo awaiting the approach of the sultan's troops. The news from Alexandria is down to April 28.

France.—The treaty with the porte is published, and in its immunities, &c. secured to French merchants, is precisely the same as the English treaty.

The ministry have met with a check in the chamber of peers. The proposition to create a grand council of the legion of honor met with violent opposition from Soult and Villenain. The ministers have abandoned their intention of publishing a government journal.

London markets, June 13.—Money is more scarce. Five per cent. was the minimum on any stock. Sales to some extent were made in English bank stock, causing a depression of 1 1/2 per cent. The bank, it is thought, will not be able to pay even the present reduced rates of dividend, and will require further alterations. Exchange bills have fallen, being heavy at 29 to 30 prems. Consols, 94, buyers for the account.

Liverpool cotton market, June 13.—The market still preserves a brisk appearance; the trade buying rather freely, at an advance of prices of about 1-8d per lb. since last Friday. The sales yesterday and to-day are about 9,000 bales. The import this week is large, say about 90,000 bales, principally from the United States.

Exportation of iron steamboats.—The Urania, now laying at the N. W. side of Prince's dock, and nearly ready for sea, takes with her to South America, three iron steamboats, or rather the materials for their construction, in large pieces of plate iron, rivetted together, each forming a section or portion of the respective boats for which it was moulded or fashioned, so that the whole may with facility be put together on arriving at their port of destination. The plates are from a quarter of an inch to three-eighths in thickness, and are beautifully rivetted. The engines to propel these vessels (also on board the Urania) are, we learn, from 20 to 39 horse power. The vessels are from the celebrated manufactory of iron vessels of Messrs. Laird, of Woodside. They are destined for Montevideo.

The proceeds of the benefit at Drury-lane theatre, for the benefit of the widow and family of the late Mr. Haynes Bayley, the dramatist, the house having been filled to its full complement, realized about £400. The duchess of Beaufort, the marchioness of Tavistock, lady Nugent, and the hon. Mrs. Norton, were the leading ladies of rank who interested themselves on behalf of Mrs. Bayley.

LATEST FROM CANTON.

By the ship London, capt. Brace, we have Canton papers to the 5th of March. Considerable anxiety was felt by the foreign residents, on account of the unusual severity of the Chinese government, which appears to devote a large share of its attention to the "outside barbarians." An envoy from the emperor was daily expected, who was to look into matters and report.

An order had been issued by the governor, commanding the back doors of the foreign factories to be stopped up, as a security against smuggling. The foreigners "petitioned," but the governor insisted.

The Br. schr. Attaran, with 130 chests of opium on board, and a quantity of specie, was lost near the island of Nampang, China, Feb. 3d. Captain and crew saved, together with about $3,000 in specie. After they abandoned the vessel she was burnt by the Chinese.

The interference of the government officers for the suppression of the sale and use of opium occasioned some disturbances; but we confess we think they are doing a good work, and hope the Almighty will prosper them. The following letter will convey some idea of the nature of the squabbles alluded to:

Extract of a letter from captain Parry, dated Hong Kong, 2d March, 1839.

"As to reports of Hong Kong annoyances prevalent at Canton, all are not true. The mandarin junks have been of late more numerous than usual, and have prevented our usual customers from coming off so frequently. A few grog-shops that furnished drunken sailors, on Sundays, with samshoo, have been burnt; a very good riddance. This has been the amount of all the great annoyances you have heard of. The mandarin people are civil enough to us. I have heard of five ralls preparing to destroy us, and we have been on our guard against them. I am of opinion they intend no such measures; and we need do nothing harsh, while they are quiet. We had messages from the large mandarin yesterday and to-day, asking us to remove for two or three weeks any where we please. His opinion is, the commissioners will be down in about seven days; and he is anxious for our disappearance from the inner waters. We intend leaving on Monday morning, and looking out for some place in the outer waters. I think about the south end of Lantao. [Signed] E. PARRY.

Extract from a private letter from Macao.
A small row arose here two nights since. Four custom house hoppo-men were engaged in snuffing patna, each two balls. They were set upon by a mandarin and ten men—boat inside harbor—one or two of the balls were seized; a confederate ran to the hoppo-house, and thirty coolies took back the man seized and his two balls, and walked off with the small soldier crew; this I have from an old servant of mine, now inside the hoppo-house; can this last?

H. B. M. stoop of war Lame, capt. Blake, having arrived in the Macao roads, the British residents requested that she might not leave until the pending difficulties should be in some way adjusted.—The British superintendent, capt. Elliot, accordingly requested capt. Blake to remain for a few days. In his letter to the committee of merchants, he says:—

"I may observe, however, that my chief object in requesting capt. Blake to remain, was to enable me to report to the authorities above mentioned; in order that such immediate and effectual steps may be taken for the protection of British interests in this quarter, as the emergencies of the case appear to them to demand."

Another letter from captain Elliot, of the same date, is to the following effect:

Canton, 2nd March, 1839.
GENTLEMEN:—I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 26th ult. to the address of the deputy superintendent, and I beg to acquaint you that it is not my intention to hoist the British flag at Canton, in the present posture of circumstances.

I am sensible, gentlemen, of the extreme hazard to which the lives and property of the whole foreign community are exposed by the recurrence of so dismal and exciting an event as that which forms the subject of your letter: And it will be my duty to make an early communication to her majesty's subjects, in explanation of the proceedings I propose to take, for leading the governor to refrain from measures that cannot fail to burden his excellency and his government, with the responsibility of some terrible catastrophe.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your obedient humble servant,
CHARLES ELLIOT,
Chief superintendent.

To William Bell, esq. and others, her majesty's subjects, Canton.
Canton, Feb. 19.—We learn, with the deepest regret, that such activity prevailed in the opium market at Bombay, and that the manufacture of the drug is still continued in very large quantities.

We must confess that—though always cautious in discussing this question—in expressing either our hopes or fears on the subject of the legalization of opium, by the Chinese government, or its firm determination to attempt, at whatever sacrifice, to put a final stop to the trade, and as to what would be the probable results of either measure—we must now confess that our apprehensions for the state of the trade, for some time time to come, are now too powerful to be suppressed.

Canton, March 5. The heavy speculations in the drug in Bombay and Calcutta, under the present strict suspension of the trade in China must lead to the most disastrous consequences; and it would be a wise course to suspend the cultivation of the drug in Bengal and Malwa, until the real determination of the Peking government is known; whether it will lose the foreign trade on the moral plea it has often advanced and so often rendered futile by its own corruption.

We understand from native information that H. E. Lin, the imperial envoy may be expected to arrive from the capital of Keenoo about the 3d or 4th of the second moon: 18th instant.

COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

From the Globe.

According to the custom house returns to the treasury department, recently published, the total value of imports during the year ending September 30th, 1835, was $113,717,404, being twenty-seven millions less than during the year 1837, and seventy-nine millions less than during the year 1836, the year of the great expansion, that preceded the suspension of specie payments.

The falling off in the exports has not been so great. The total value of exports of every description from the United States, during the last year, was $108,486,616, being nine millions less than in 1837, and twenty millions less than in 1836. The value of the exports of domestic produce in 1838 was $96,032,816, in 1837, $95,564,414, and in 1836, $106,916,680.

Comparing the years 1838 and 1836, we find that the chief falling off in the imports was in the following articles:

	1836.	1838.
Cotton goods,	$17,876,987	$6,399,330
Woolen goods,	12,738,430	6,967,530
Silk goods,	22,862,177	9,812,308
Linen,	8,271,212	3,583,540
Iron and steel,	12,892,643	4,115,504
Sugar,	12,514,718	7,856,825
Teas,	5,342,811	3,497,156
Wines,	4,322,034	2,318,202

This table exhibits in a striking light the effects which expansions and contractions of the currency have on the import trade.

One article, molasses, seems not to have been affected by these changes in the currency. The value of that imported in 1836 was $4,077,312, and in 1838 $3,865,285.

In the import of another article, viz: coffee, there was relatively speaking, but a small falling off. The total value in 1836 was $9,653,053, and in 1838, $7,640,217.

Salt is the only commodity, or at least the only commodity of any importance, the import of which increased. In 1836 the total value was $724,527; in 1838 it was $1,028,418.

In the exports, the chief falling off was in cotton, tobacco and rice. In some articles of export there was an increase, as will be seen by inspecting the following table:

	1836.	1838.
Cotton,	$71,284,925	$61,556,811
Tobacco,	10,058,640	7,392,029
Rice,	2,548,750	1,721,819
Flour,	3,752,599	3,693,299
Fish,	967,890	619,093
Furs,	653,662	636,945
Lumber,	2,860,691	3,116,196
Manufactures,	6,107,528	8,397,078

The export of cotton goods of domestic manufacture in 1838, was $3,758,755, against $2,891,473 in 1837, and $2,255,734 in 1836. The chief exports of domestic cottons in 1838, were to the following countries:

China,	$532,097
British East Indies,	140,762
Dutch East Indies,	132,350
Manilla,	79,531
Peru,	97,713
Chili,	640,831
Argentine Republic,	104,254
Brazil,	536,416
Mexico,	597,330
Cuba,	157,621
Cape de Verd Islands,	66,555
Turkey, Levant, &c.	111,937

The following table exhibits the relative importance of our trade during the year 1838, with the following countries:

	Imports from	Exports to
Great Britain and dependencies,	$49,051,181	$58,843,392
France and dependencies,	18,087,149	16,252,413
Spain and dependencies,	15,971,394	7,684,006
Netherlands and dependencies,	2,436,166	3,772,206
China,	4,764,536	1,698,433
Mexico,	3,500,709	2,164,097
Texas,	165,718	2,127,850

With the same countries, (omitting Texas), our trade was as follows in 1836:

	Imports from	Exports to
Great Britain and dependencies,	$86,022,915	$64,487,550
France and do.	37,306,235	21,441,200
Spain and do.	19,345,690	8,081,668
Netherlands and do.	3,561,513	4,799,157
China,	7,324,516	1,194,264
Mexico,	5,615,819	6,041,625

In 1838, our imports from Great Britain were nearly thirty-seven millions less than in 1836, and from France nineteen millions.

In 1836, the commercial balance, as exhibited by the custom house books, nearly twenty-two millions in favor of Great Britain. In 1838, the balance is nearly ten millions in favor of the United States.

In 1836 the balance in favor of France was nearly sixteen millions. In 1838 it was less than two millions.

The following exhibits the total value of the imports and exports of the states which were most deeply engaged in the foreign trade during the year 1838:

	Imports into	Exports from
Massachusetts,	$13,300,295	$9,104,862
New York,	65,438,206	28,005,471
Pennsylvania,	9,360,731	3,478,151
Maryland,	5,701,869	4,524,575
Virginia,	577,142	3,986,228
South Carolina,	2,318,791	11,042,070
Georgia,	776,668	8,803,839
Alabama	524,548	9,638,244
Louisiana,	9,496,808	31,502,343

In that ever memorable year, 1836, the foreign trade of these states was as follows:

	Imports into	Exports from
Massachusetts,	$25,661,462	$10,280,346
New York,	118,253,416	28,920,638
Pennsylvania,	15,068,233	3,971,555
Maryland,	7,131,667	3,675,475
Virginia,	1,106,814	6,192,040
South Carolina,	2,601,361	13,683,376
Georgia,	573,222	10,722,200
Alabama,	651,618	11,184,166
Louisiana,	15,117,649	37,179,829

The various facts here stated abound in instruction to both the merchant and the statesman, but we have no time to make comments.

COMMERCE AND WHEAT TRADE OF BLACK ROCK AND BUFFALO.

From the Buffalo Advertiser and Journal.

We have obtained from the canal collector at Black Rock, the following statement of the arrival of wheat and flour from the lakes, and shipments of the canal, with the tolls paid up to the 1st inst. They present the following:

51 arrivals of vessels from Ohio, 124,610 bushel wheat; 5,446 barrels flour; 12,253 bushels corn.

12 arrivals of vessels from Canada, with 480,000 feet lumber.

All the wheat arriving was on account of the mills at Black Rock, and manufactured into flour. The shipments of flour from the mills, by canal to Albany, up to the 1st of July, were 28,319 bbls. Add to this 5,447 bbls. Ohio flour which arrived in vessels—making a total of 32,766.

Besides a considerable quantity sent to this city for retail, which does not appear on the collector's books.

The amount of tolls collected at Black Rock to 1st July, was $17,826, being the first season of the toll office, and as yet the flourishing mills being hardly completed, and only in partial operation. The canal tolls at Black Rock equal those of Utica.

From the returns of the Buffalo collector's office we find that 352,726 bushels of wheat have been received from the states west of us, and forwarded to eastern mills, up to the same date, besides 11,410 barrels flour, the last being equal to 636,376 bushels wheat, at 4 1/2 bushels to the barrel, and showing that the whole export of western wheat this season, through Buffalo to Black Rock, up to 1st July, is 1,113,262 bushels; and that less than three-fifths of the whole amount is in the shape of flour, and over two-fifths in the raw material.

From these statements the following facts may be drawn.

Of the 1,113,262 bushels of wheat exported from the states west of us, 636,376 bushels are in the manufactured article; and 476,886 bushels in the raw material for manufacture in this state. Of this last quantity, over one-fourth part, or 124,610 bushels, were received and manufactured at the Black Rock mills adjoining the city of Buffalo, and identified with our own interests and commerce. The other three-fifths, or 352,276 bushels, have passed on to eastern mills for manufacture; but which, legitimately, as we contend, because we can do it cheaper by many cents the barrel, belong to our own mills for manufacture, and as our milling capital increases, it must of necessity engross almost the entire export of wheat from the west; for being fed from Lake Erie, our mills will never lack water, nor be limited in extent.

As nearly three-fourths of the western flour forwarded through Buffalo was received from the Ohio canal, the near which the greatest portion of the wheat of that state is located, we may fairly infer that a large portion of the increase of wheat to be raised in that state, and the states west, where there is comparatively a limited and scanty water power, will be sent forward in its raw state for manufacture; and we may anticipate that when the canals now nearly completed, which are to stretch from the lakes into the interior of western Ohio, and rail roads through Michigan and Wisconsin, shall penetrate those wheat producing sections, full three-fourths of their future export will be floured at this point for an eastern market, so eligibly will our own mills accommodate its manufacture over those of any other location in the state.

The whole western export of raw wheat through Buffalo, eastward, and to the Black Rock mills, in 1839, was a trifle over 1,000,000 bushels, not one of which was floured at the latter.

Up to the 1st of July, in 1839, almost one-half that quantity has arrived, one-fourth of which is manufactured at Black Rock; and if the present promising condition of the wheat crop is realized not less than 1,500,000 bushels of wheat will arrive at our place and at Black Rock, for an eastern market, and possibly 2,000,000!

In 1845, the period named by the commissioners for the completion of the enlarged Erie canal, and when the great lines of canal and rail road west of us will be completed, we hazard little in asserting that the export of native wheat by Lake Erie, in bulk, will amount to 5,000,000 bushels, every pound of which may be floured almost at our own doors, pay $100,000 toll to the canal fund, and employ 5,000 industrious population in the manufacture of that article alone.—We need only to will, and its performance is certain.

Who, then, can place a limit to the immense wheat trade in the lake regions in the next ten years, and the value of its manufacture to our city accessible as we are with an unlimited water power sufficient to all vessels and boats, and only requiring the necessary nominal capital to set it in operation.—It must make us the strongest inland point in America.

INTERNATIONAL LAW.

From the Albany Daily Advertiser.

During the past winter the rights of the governor of any state to demand for or deliver up to foreign governments fugitives from justice, became a subject of frequent discussion. The opinions elicited in the course of the argument were various and conflicting. By some it was contended that this right must necessarily belong to the chief magistrate of the state from which the felon had fled, or within which he had sought to screen himself in the pursuit of justice. It was argued by others that the general government was the sole organ of communication with foreign powers known to our laws, that government only could make or receive requisitions for fugitives from justice. While a third party insisted that as this was a matter for treaty stipulations, and as there were none in force between this country and Great Britain, this right, as between these two countries, was vested nowhere. Our own belief, heretofore expressed, was that, treaty or no treaty, our existence as a nation implied the existence of this right somewhere; and that from the very nature of our government, it must be vested, not in the executives of the several states, but in the president of the United States. It is well known that a requisition was made, some months since, by sir George Arthur upon the governor of Vermont, for the delivery of an individual who had committed murder within the Canadian provinces, and had thence fled to Vermont. Gov. Jenison having first referred the matter to the general government, and received for answer that, in the absence of any positive regulations, either by treaty or act of congress in this particular subject, the president declined interfering, acceded to the demand of sir George Arthur, and issued a warrant for the delivery of the fugitive to the Canadian authorities. At this stage of the business, however, a writ of habeas corpus arrested further proceedings until the authority of the executive to deliver up a fugitive to a foreign government could be settled in a court of law. The final issue of this matter is not yet known. An application has since been made to gov. Seward for a requisition upon sir George Arthur for the delivery of Hugh Tracy, who committed a robbery in the city of Buffalo in May last, and immediately thereafter fled to Toronto with the stolen property in his possession. To this application gov. Seward returned an answer, a copy of which (as the subject is one of general interest) we have solicited and now submit to our readers.

—Albany, May 20th, 1839.

HENRY W. ROGERS, esq. district attorney of Erie county, Buffalo.

DEAR SIR: I have received your communication of the 16th instant, requesting me to make a requisition upon his excellency sir George Arthur, lieutenant-governor of the province of Upper Canada, for the delivery of Hugh Tracy, to the end that he may be brought to this state to be tried for a felony committed within this state.

The law of nations recognises the mutual rights of states to demand the surrender of fugitives from justice. The regulation of these, however, is a proper subject for treaties, and the refusal of a state to comply with such a requisition, in a reasonable case is just cause for war. The right to demand and the obligation to surrender are reciprocal. I am satisfied that the authority necessary to the exercise of this right, rests with the general government, and not with the governments of the states. The constitution devolves upon the general government the care of foreign relations. That government has the sole power to make treaties with foreign states, and the right to declare war and establish peace. It thus possesses the power to establish regulations for the exercise of this important right, and to enforce compliance with its requisitions when unreasonably refused by other states, while the state governments have no power to establish general regulations and no means to enforce their requisitions.

Application was made to me in a case similar to that now presented, for a requisition upon the lieutenant-governor of Upper Canada, for the delivery of a person charged with a felony committed in this state. I considered it my duty to refer the applicant to the general government. The answer of the secretary of state was in substance, that inasmuch as congress had not passed any law on the subject, and there was no provision by treaty in relation to it, the general government had declined to act upon such applications. The view of the subject taken by the general government, has served only to convince me that the ground I had assumed was correct. If the right could be exercised by the general government, provided its exercise should be regulated by law of congress or by treaty, the jurisdiction belongs to that government and not to those of the state; and if the general government possess a law of congress or a treaty, the provisions of a law of congress or the intervention of a treaty, the state governments, even if admitted to divide the responsibility with the general government, could not exercise the power without a similar law or the intervention of a treaty.

I can imagine no circumstance which would more seriously embarrass the general government in its conduct of the foreign relations of the country, and more certainly tend to bring the public peace into jeopardy, than the discordant action of the several states in the exercise of this power. I have observed that the governor of Vermont has taken a different view of the subject from that here presented; and that having issued his warrant for the delivery of a fugitive, upon the requisition of the governor of Upper Canada, a writ of habeas corpus has been issued by a judge of that state, and that the constitutional power of the executive is now undergoing discussion there. Unwilling in any instance to assume doubtful powers, and especially in cases so important to the security of our citizens and to the harmony of our foreign relations, I have concluded that it is inexpedient to deliver citizens of this state upon the demand of the government of foreign states, until the constitutional power of the executive department of the state government is more clearly defined and established. Having arrived at this conclusion, it follows that I cannot demand from other states the surrender of fugitives from this state.

While the view I have presented assumes that the constitutional power and responsibility relating to this subject rest with the general government, I apprehend from a passage in your communication that you are in error, in supposing that there is any provision by a statute of this state authorising the governor to make requisitions upon the governments of foreign countries for the delivery of persons who have committed crimes in this state.

I am fully sensible of the inconvenience resulting from the want of suitable regulations for the exercise of this important national power, and I shall deem it my duty in a respectful manner, to bring the subject to the consideration of the president of the United States. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

THE COLONIZATION CAUSE.

From the Norfolk Beacon.

The progress of the settlement of Africa is one of the most interesting experiments of civilization that is now carrying out in this age of daring enterprise and boundless philanthropy. That it will succeed ultimately would seem almost certain. Events are on the wing that will insure to the colonies an accession of free people of color, and it is the dictate of prudence as well as humanity to prepare the means for their settlement. Every ship-load of emigrants is a spoke in the general wheel, and establishes on stronger foundations the infant colonies. We have spoken of humanity and benevolence as impelling our citizens in contributing to the relief and removal of the free blacks, but we might use other and more practical arguments. To pass over many that will suggest themselves in a slaveholding country, we would state our belief that in less than twenty years the trade with the new African settlements will be one of considerable extent and great profit.

We copy the following from the Philadelphia North American:

LIBERIA. The despatches by the Saluda are highly gratifying. Governor BUCHANAN, on the day after his arrival, convened the citizens of Monrovia, and presented for their acceptance the new constitution of the commonwealth of Liberia, of which he was the bearer, and which was adopted. The following extracts are taken from the report of his tour:

"The day after my inauguration I started on a visit to the upper settlements, accompanied by the colonial secretary, Mr. Teage, Mr. Brauder, member of council, and two other gentlemen. Though we passed rapidly from place to place, and though notice of our approach had preceded us only a few hours, the people were assembled in the several villages on our arrival, and received us with enthusiastic welcome and firing of cannon, and other demonstrations of public rejoicing. The necessity of returning immediately to Monrovia compelled me in several cases to disappoint the kind intentions of the citizens by foregoing their invitations to public dinners prepared for the occasion. I could only limit my stay to the time required for a short address—reading the constitution and the letter of the board. These documents were well received, and the constitution seemed to give universal satisfaction.

I was very much gratified, in passing up the St. Paul's, to see the extent of improvement since my last visit, three years ago. From New Georgia to Millsburgh, a distance of about 17 miles, the right bank of the river exhibits an almost continuous line of cultivated farms, many of them, too, of considerable size. The opposite shore still wears the rich foliage of the unbroken forest, and presents one of the most beautiful specimens of native scenery; but though ever charmed with the luxuriant drapery of an African forest, I must say there was in this case something in the appearance of the right bank, with its line of neat cottages, the waving fields of rice and corn, and even in the blackened clearings, just preparing for the seed of the husbandman, more charming to my feelings than in all the wild beauties with which nature has so profusely embellished this sunny land.

"We arrived at Millsburgh some time before evening, and after the meeting took a stroll over the settlement and ascended a fine eminence a short distance from the river, whence we had a good view of the village and the surrounding country. Millsburgh is pleasantly situated, and exhibits a highly picturesque appearance from almost any point of view. It has but one street which runs parallel with the river, and is about a mile and a half long. This street is neatly turpiked and bordered the whole distance on both sides with plantain and banana trees, which throw over it an air at once refreshing and ornamental.

"Judging from the neat and thrifty appearance of the houses, and the highly cultivated enclosures, I should say there are none but independent people in this beautiful settlement, and indeed all my inquiries confirmed the first impression. Of course I use the word 'independent' in a moderate sense. There were about 4,000 bushels potatoes raised here last year, besides corn, cassava, rice and various garden vegetables. This year there is, both at Millsburgh and along the whole line of the St. Paul's, at least ten times the quantity of corn planted that has been in any former year.

"New Georgia I found the same thrifty and prosperous place whose appearance so excited my admiration on my first visit, three years since. The village seemed but little changed, but the environs showed the substantial sources of comfort and wealth. I visited the public farm; every thing looked well. About thirty acres of crops were growing, nine of which are sugar-cane, which promise well, and will be ready to harvest by the first of September, at which time also our sugar mill will be ready to run."

On visiting Basa Cove and Edina, the governor remarks: "Since the first of June last, not less than two hundred acres of lands have been cleared and sowed in the two settlements, and the business of clearing land and planting was still going on with vigor that astonished me."

In speaking of the slave trade which is carried on this season on the western coast of Africa with an activity hardly ever known, he says: "Never was the American flag so extensively used by those pirates upon liberty and humanity as at present. Probably three-fourths of the vessels boarded by English cruisers, and found to be slavers, are protected by American papers and the American flag. Those vessels are generally American built, many of them owned by merchants in the cities of — and —, and the papers are signed by the American consul at —. I will give you a statement of facts in relation to the slave-trade as carried on, on the west coast of Africa, under our national flag, in a few days."

The friends of colonization will be gratified to learn that the Saluda will leave Philadelphia on the 23d inst. for Norfolk, Virginia, and sail from this last port for Liberia on the first of August, with emigrants and stores. As we understand that many of the emigrants are unprovided for, and the stores required for the colony are large, may we not hope that the friends of the cause every where will aid the society by sending forward to Washington, instantly, liberal contributions?

CREEK RESERVATIONS.

From the Washington Globe.

We understand that the war department has been for some time past diligently engaged in the examination of appeals from the decisions of the commissioners appointed by the president to investigate the titles to Creek reservations, and as we are aware the result is anxiously looked for by the parties interested, we publish without delay the decision of the department upon a numerous class of cases. A list of these cases, together with that of such contracts as were considered unobjectionable by the commissioners, will soon be submitted to the president for his approval, as soon as they can be prepared.

The great mass of evidence furnished since the report of the commissioners was presented, has rendered the investigation more tedious, and occasioned greater delay than was expected; but there is reason to believe that the remaining cases, which are now under consideration, will promptly be disposed of. We are happy to learn, likewise, that the conflicting claims under the contract made by Gen. Jessup with Messrs. Watson & Co. are likely to be amicably adjusted, with the approbation of the president; so that all the vexed questions arising from the sale of Creek reservations under the treaty, are on the eve of being finally settled.

REGULATIONS.

Satisfactory explanations having been given, and in the opinion of the department, sufficient evidence having been adduced to cure the defects arising from irregularities in the certificates given to purchasers of Creek reservations, by the agents of the United States, who acted under the authority of the president, viz: gen. Sandford, Dr. McHenry, judge Tarrant, and T. J. Abbott, esq. in the several districts of the Creek territory assigned to them, a list of all such cases embraced by the following descriptive classifications will be made out, in order that it may be submitted to the president for his approval.

1. Cases suspended because the certificates were irregular inasmuch as they did not contain a sufficiently distinct or adequate description of the land, or where as in some instances, such description was omitted altogether.
2. Where the certificate does not state that the money was paid in the presence of the agent.
3. Where the contract is certified to different persons from those mentioned in the bond to the Indian.
4. Where the signer of the bond is represented as a female, and the printed parts of the certificates are not so altered as to designate the sex.
5. Where irregularities have been noted in the contracts sent to the office of Indian affairs, and subsequently corrected without proper explanations being given.
6. Where the bond was taken from the Indian in blank and subsequently filled up.
7. Where there is no date to certificate, and it has been supposed that the contracts were certified after the resignation or removal of the agent.
8. Where there exists in the numbers of township or range—the contract to be compared with, and the error to be corrected by the book of locations.

RIVER DISTANCES IN THE WEST.

We repeat from the Wheeling Times, the publication of the following table, showing the distances from each other of the places named, and from them, with the prices of passage. It is proper to observe, that these are the established rates, but that some boats charge less, the prices depending in some degree upon the number of boats in port, and the abundance or scarcity of passengers:

Natchez,	110	1,608 30 00
New Orleans, Louisiana,	300	1,908 35 00

The above prices of passages include boarding. The prices of deck passage are about one-fourth of these, the passengers finding themselves. Thus to Louisville the deck passage is $3, cabin 12; to New Orleans, deck 8, cabin 35. The deck is covered, and contains berths, but it is a very undesirable way of travelling. The passage to Louisville is generally performed in two and half days, and to New Orleans in from eight to ten; returning, nearly double this time. The ordinary speed of the boats is twelve miles an hour down the river, and six up.

GREEN MOUNT CEMETERY.

We have seldom if ever spent two hours more delightfully than in witnessing the dedication of the Green Mount cemetery to the purposes of sepulture, which took place on the afternoon of Saturday last. The day was unusually pleasant, the heat being moderated by a refreshing breeze, and showed the landscape and in all the glories of summer unmarked by the searing effects of drought by which the season of harvest is generally attended. For some time previous to the hour named for the ceremony, crowds of citizens were seen repairing to the place of meeting, whilst carriages and rail road cars filled with well dressed people hurried along in the same direction.

At the entrance to the grounds the carriages were left, and the parties with whom they had been filled strolled leisurely along the walks shaded by majestic trees and surrounded by shrubbery disposed on all sides with the greatest taste. On approaching the spot appropriated to the ceremony, we found an extensive stage erected, on which was seated the mayor, the members of the city council, the officiating clergymen, the orator of the day, and the musical association of Baltimore, the members of which had kindly offered their aid; whilst the surrounding space was occupied by a vast concourse of as orderly and well attired persons as we have ever seen drawn together. As may well be supposed, the sight of the assembled multitude, the staidness of the scene, and the solemnity of shade coupled with the object for which the thousands present had met together, producing a state of feeling well adapted to the imposing rites in which they were about to take a part. The early days of Christianity as described in the pages of history pressed themselves upon our recollection, and we could almost imagine that we had gone back to times when the followers of our blessed Redeemer were forced to fly to the wilderness, there to offer up their prayers and thanksgivings beneath the wide spread canopy of heaven.

At the appointed hour the ceremonies commenced with the performance of a beautiful and appropriate chorale, from the oratorio of St. Paul, beginning "Sleepers awake! a voice is calling." by the musical association, accompanied by a full orchestra. So soon as the sound of the music had died away, the rev. Dr. Hylott, rector of St. Paul's, arose, and whilst the attendant multitude stood uncovered, offered up to the throne of the Most High a prayer, in which deep devotional feeling was happily blended with great beauty of language and perfect appropriateness of thought to the occasion.—In his appeal he extended to the usage of the patriarchs of old in setting apart "a field for the burial of the dead," and dwelt with touching eloquence upon the moral and religious influences that arise from manifestations of due respect to the remains of departed worth. He spoke of the grave as the vestibule to another world, where the loves and friendships of this transitory life may be renewed, never again to be marred by care and suffering, but to become purer and brighter throughout eternity.

The prayer was succeeded by the following

HYMN,

Composed for the occasion by J. H. B. Latrobe, esq.

We meet not now where pillar'd aisles,
In lone and dim perspective fade;
No dome, by human hands uprear'd,
Gives to this spot its solemn shade.
Our temple is the woody vale,
It shines these grateful hearts of ours;
Our incense is the balmy gale,
Whose perfume is the spoil of flowers.

Yet here, where now the living meet,
The shruded dead ere long will rest,
And grass now trod beneath our feet,
Will mournful wave above our breast.
Here birds will sing their notes of praise,
When summer hours are bright and warm;
And winter's sweeping winds will raise,
The sounding anthems of the storm.

Then now, while life's warm currents flow,
While restless throbs the anxious heart,
Teach us, oh Lord, thy power to know,
Thy grace, oh Lord, our God, impart:
That when, beneath this verdant soil,
Our dust to kindred dust is given;
Our souls, released from mortal coil,
May find, with thee, their rest in heaven.

At the termination of the hymn Mr. Kennedy, made an address, in commendation of which it would be difficult to say too much. It was evident that the subject on which he discoursed had possession of the feelings of the gifted speaker, who availed himself in the happiest manner of his extended classical attainments and great descriptive power, in arguing upon his views of the social and moral influences connected with the occasion. The address was received with a degree of attention that could not have failed to gratify the orator. Mr. Kennedy, having resumed his seat, the following hymn was sung:

HYMN,

Composed for the occasion, by F. H. Duvidge, esq.

Point of mercies—source of love,
List the hymns we raise to thee;
From thy holy throne above,
Heedful of our worship be.

Creatures of thy sov'reign will,
At thy feet we humbly bend;
Let thy grace our bosoms fill;
Be our comfort—be our friend.

Here beneath the sunlit sky,
With thy gifts around us spread;
We beseech thee—from on high—
Bless these dwellings of the dead.

Guard them when the summer's glow,
Decks with beauties, hill and dale;
Guard them when the winter's snow
Spreads o'er all its mantle pale.

Here—when wearied pilgrims cease,
O'er life's chequered scenes to roam,
May their ashes rest in peace,
Till thy voice shall call them home.

Then, oh then—their trials done,
Bid them rest to worship thee,
While the ransomed of thy Son,
Join in endless harmony.

A benediction, pronounced by the rev. Mr. Hamner, closed the impressive ceremonies of the occasion. [Balt. American.]

THE CHARACTER OF WASHINGTON.

The beautiful eulogium which the reader will find below, is the production of the chaste and classic mind of the late venerable and distinguished senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Robbins, and was occasioned by the following circumstances: During the session of 1837, Mr. Webster entertained a large party of friends at dinner, among them, the venerable senator we have named. The evening passed off with much hilarity, enlivened with wit and sentiment; but during the greater part of the time, Mr. Robbins maintained that grave but placid silence which was his habit. While thus apparently abstracted, some one suddenly called on him for a toast, which call was seconded by the company. He rose and in his surprise asked if they were serious in making such a demand of so old a man; and being assured that they were, he said if they would suspend their hilarity for a few moments he would give them a toast and preface it with a few observations. Having thus secured a breathless stillness, he went on to remark that they were then on the verge of the 22d of February the anniversary of the birth of the great patriot and statesman of our country, whom all delighted to remember and to honor; and he hoped he might be allowed the privilege of an aged man to recur for a few moments to past events connected with his character and history. He then proceeded and delivered in the most happy and impressive manner the beautiful speech which now grace our columns. The whole company were electrified by his patriotic enthusiasm; and one of the guests, before they separated, begged that he would take the trouble to put on paper what he had so happily expressed, and furnish a copy for publication. Mr. R. obligingly complied with his request on the following day, but by some accident the manuscript was lost, and he did not search for it until a few days ago when it was unexpectedly recovered, and is now presented to our readers. [Vit. Int.]

On the near approach of that calendar-day which gave birth to Washington, I feel rekindling within me some of those emotions always connected with the recollection of that hallowed name. Permit me to indulge them on this occasion, for a moment in a few remarks, as preliminary to a sentiment which I shall beg leave to propose.

I consider it as one of the consolations of my age that I am old enough and fortunate enough to have seen that wonderful man. This happiness is still common to so many yet among the living, that less is thought of it now than it will be in after times; but it is no less a happiness to me on that account.

When I was a boy at school, I saw him for the first time; he then was passing through New England to take the command in chief of the American armies at Cambridge. Never shall I forget the impression his imposing presence made on my young imagination; so superior did he seem to me to all that I had seen or imagined of the human form for striking effect. I remember with what delight, in my after studies, I came to the line in Virgil that expressed all the enthusiasm of my own feelings, as inspired by that presence, and which I could not often enough repeat:

"Credo equidem, nec vara fides, gemmas esse deorum."

I saw him again at his interview with Rochambeau, when they met to settle the plans of combined operations between the French fleet and the American armies against the British on the Chesapeake; and then I saw the immense crowd drawn together from all the neighboring towns to get, if possible, one look at the man who had thrown himself in every heart. Not one of that immense crowd doubted the final triumph of his country in her arduous conflict; for every one saw, or thought he saw, in Washington, her guardian angel, commissioned by heaven to insure her that triumph. Nil desperandum was the motto with every one.

"Nil desperandum, Teneo duce, auspice Teucero."

In after life, when the judgment corrects the extravagance of early impressions, I saw him on several occasions, and yet nothing at other to admonish me of any extravagance in my early impression. The impression was still the same; I had the same overpowering sense of being in the presence of some superior being.

It is indeed remarkable, and I believe unique in the history of men, that Washington made the same impression upon all minds, at all places, and at once. When his fame first broke upon the world, it spread at once over the whole world. By the consent of mankind—the universal sentiment—he was placed at the head of the human species; above all envy, because above all emulation; for no one then pretended or has pretended to be—at least who has been allowed to be—the co-rival of Washington in fame.

When the great Frederick of Prussia sent his portrait to Washington, with this inscription upon it, "From the oldest general in Europe to the greatest general in the world," he did but echo the sentiment of all the chivalry of Europe. Nor was the sentiment confined to Europe, nor to the bonds of civilization; for the Arabs of the desert talked of Washington in his tent, his name wandered with the wandering Scythian, and was cherished by him as a household word in all his migrations; nor did he seem so barbarous as to be a stranger to the name; but every where, and by all men, that name was placed at the same point of elevation, and above compeer. As it was in the beginning so it now; of the future we cannot speak with certainty. Some future age, in the endless revolutions of time, may produce another Washington; but the greater probability is that he is destined to remain forever, as he now is, the Phenix of human kind.

What a possession to his country is such a fame!

Such a "Clarum et venerabile nomen
"Centibus!"

To all his countrymen it gives, and forever will give a passport to respect wherever they go, to whatever part of the globe; for his country is in every other identified with that fame.

What, then, is incumbent upon us, his countrymen? Why, to be such a people as shall be worthy of such a fame—a people of whom it shall be said, "No wonder such a people have produced such a man as Washington." I give you, therefore, this sentiment: The memory of Washington! May his countrymen prove themselves a people worthy of his fame.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

From the Army and Navy Chronicle.

REPORT OF THE BOARD OF VISITERS.

U. S. Military Academy, West Point, June 20, 1839.

To the hon. J. R. Forsyth, Secretary of war.—

Sir: The board of visitors, assembled at this place pursuant to your request, have attended the examination of the cadets, and, at the conclusion of their labors, beg leave to report to you the results of their observations upon the subjects particularly referred to in your communications, as well as upon others relating to this institution.

However pacific may be the general policy of a government, there will always exist a necessity of cultivating the arts and sciences which are essential to a state of war; and though it may, for a season, be happily exempted from the evils of war, it is not always in its choice to avoid them. Provision must, therefore, be made by public authority, not only for instruction in those arts and sciences, but for the progressive improvements in them, which contribute essentially to success in military operations. Neither of these can be well obtained without a public establishment, supplied with conveniences and able instructors. Some establishment of this kind would seem to be the more essential in governments maintaining, ordinarily, a very small military force, and that force separated into small detachments, and occupying stations remote from each other.

The peculiar situation of the United States, with a much smaller military force than any other nation, compared with its extent of territory and population, and that force dispersed into the various sections of the union, renders a public school for instruction in the arts and sciences appertaining to a condition of war, indispensable.

Presuming that the necessity of a military institution, embracing the objects for which this has been established, will be generally conceded, the public solicitude will naturally be led to the inquiry, whether these objects are obtained to the utmost practicable extent by the general management and the course of instruction at this academy.

The advantages which this institution derives from its location, must be well known to all who have visited West Point. The facility of securing the cadets from an intercourse that would be injurious, in many respects, and especially in reference to the interruption of their studies; the combination of the benefits of an expeditious and cheap communication with all parts of the union; the purity of the atmosphere, furnishing the best security for continued healthiness, and the animating associations with which the position is surrounded, as the scene and the centre of many important operations of the revolutionary war; all conspire to justify the selection of the post for a military academy. In close connection with this topic, our attention could not fail to be attracted, in a particular manner, directed to the condition and character of the buildings on the plain, in relation to which we will here briefly present some suggestions.

The defects in the construction and arrangement of the barracks for the cadets are not only conspicuous, but very important. So far from reasonable and proper facilities for study being provided in the quarters now used, there are positive obstacles thrown in the way of the pupil, of whom the severest exercise of his intellectual faculties is required. On the score of health, too, such is the want of ventilation, and of space in the rooms, that nothing but a rigidly executed system of police has prevented even greater evils than have yet been felt. Those which exist, however, demand, by their character, an early and efficient remedy; and on this subject we respectfully, but most unequivocally and emphatically, recommend and urge a change which shall be complete and permanent. We were pleased to find that this matter had, within the last year, attracted a large share of the attention of the superintendent, and that plans had been prepared with the object of effecting a thorough alteration. By the entire removal of the mess-house, and of the south and north barracks, a very large part of the plain will be unmasked and thrown into a state adapted to military evolutions, in addition to the ground now employed; and the line of academic buildings will be preserved for convenience and for beauty. The laboratory, also, should be transferred from its present site, which, on account of the combustible nature of the contents of the various apartments, is quite too near other important edifices. The erection then, on the eastern border of the plain, along the bank of the river, of barracks, combining, in each room, all the advantages of sufficient space and a free circulation of fresh air, with such other improvements as it falls as experience has shown to be desirable, the construction of a mess-house north of these new barracks, and the establishment of the laboratory within the limits of old Fort Clinton, will present an arrangement in harmony with the existing ranges of the professor's quarters and the academic buildings, and will carry out a design admirably suited to the great objects of the academy. The superintendent submitted to the board the plans which have been matured to effect the very important changes now referred to; and, after careful consideration, we confidently and strongly recommend to the secretary of war the adoption of major Delafield's views, and the prosecution of such measures as may be requisite to obtain the appropriate legislative action.

The principles upon which candidates are admitted, open the institution to the sons of all classes of our fellow-citizens; and the practical result, in this respect, are such as are desirable. A considerable proportion of the respective classes consists of those whose parents or friends are not able, or would not feel themselves able, to educate them at the other higher literary institutions of the country. When received into the academy, they are all placed on the same level. The rules and discipline are applied with impartiality to all.—The distinctions that are permitted to exist, are only grades of merit, which are offered alike to the competition of all, and granted only in cases where they are well deserved.

It has not come to our knowledge that there is any dissatisfaction, among the cadets themselves, with the judgment of the academic board in arranging the grades of merit; and, so far as our own means of forming opinions on the subject enable us to determine, the decisions of the board have been carefully and fairly made. The same accurate judgment, we think, might be exercised in the selection of temporary military commands.

We highly approve of the regulations which have been adopted to secure to the public the benefits of the education received at this institution. The candidate, on being received here, not only enters into an engagement to remain the full term of four years, but to take a commission in the army, and to continue in it for four years; and, during this period, it is usual to refuse him permission to resign. This regulation seems to us to be a wise and necessary precaution, and to prevent applications for admission by those who do not, at the time, contemplate devoting themselves to the military service of the country.

We do not conceive it necessary to notice particularly, in our report, each branch of study or discipline, but only to allude to those in which changes have been made within the last year, or which, in our opinion, require modification. What is left without comment is to be considered as having received our approbation.

The system adopted by this institution in keeping an exact register of the daily progress of each cadet in his studies, as well as of his conduct in general, (an abstract of which is regularly forwarded to the department of war, and from thence sent to the parent or guardian of each cadet), has been attended with the most beneficial results. The knowledge of the fact that the records of his progress in study and moral conduct are open to the inspection of his parents and the community, and may effect his promotion in the army and standing in society, cannot fail to have a proper influence on the cadet, discouraging him from idleness and inattention, and stimulating him to industry and good conduct. From a careful inspection of the merit rolls, we are of opinion that this part of the discipline has been carefully attended to, and enforced with judgment and impartiality.

We find the hospital not only eligibly situated, but commodiously arranged, and quite sufficient for the wants of the station. Every thing appertaining to this department is in excellent order, and gives clear indications to us that the comfort of those who become its inmates is properly attended to.

Some inconsiderable improvements, in regard to the interior of the building, have been suggested to us by the surgeon, which meet with our approval, and we presume will be adopted when made known to the war department.

We have performed the duty, particularly required of us by one of the regulations, "of examining into the state of the police and discipline" of the institution, and are satisfied that they are both maintained in a creditable manner. The positive rules which have been prescribed are vigilantly enforced; and where, by the necessity of the case, something is left to the discretion of the officers, it has been cautiously and judiciously exercised.

The practical displays of infantry tactics by the cadets, as an organized battalion of infantry, fully correspond to the thoughts and theoretical knowledge exhibited on their examination. The cadets are also exercised in the practical duties of artillerists, which were skillfully performed; but some of the favorable circumstances essential to the acquisition of the more complicated and various practical attainments, appertaining to this description of military force, are wanting, by reason whereof they are less accomplished, in some respects, as artillerists, than as infantry soldiers.

Peculiar circumstances have hitherto existed, and we fear, will continue to exist, which present obstacles to our improvement in artillery to the extent that is to be desired. In Europe, this arm of the national force has received the greatest attention, and the most vigorous efforts have been made to improve its efficiency. We think it highly important that the particular notice of the government should be directed to this subject, to the end that the artillery may, if practicable, be placed on a better footing. Our army is so disproportioned to the extent of the line of defence to be guarded, that the regiments of artillery are called away by the public exigencies from their appropriate duties as artillery corps, to aid the infantry and dragoons in the police and protection of our extensive frontiers. The fortifications on the coasts are, consequently, left, as they came from the hands of the engineers, comparatively un manned and unarmed. The artillery soldier, who requires constant experience, has an opportunity to learn, at most, but the manual of the piece, and such simple rudiments of duty as may be acquired in a short period. The artillery officer has but little opportunity of gaining experience, and still less of adding to his stock of theoretical information. Under these circumstances, it is thought that the means of instruction in artillery, at this academy, should be as ample as the nature of the institution will permit. In the course of the first three years, the cadets are instructed, about three months in each, in the manual of the piece, and in the manoeuvres of a field battery. During the encampment of the fourth year, they attend recitations in artillery tactics and psychology; go through a course of target practice with guns, batteries, and mortars; and a course of practical instruction in the duties of the military laboratory. At the same time, they act as officers in the manoeuvres of the field battery. After the encampment of the fourth year, three months are devoted to the study of ballistics, and the general subjects relating to artillery.

A new text book, we are informed, has been recently adopted, which, with the notes of the present instructor on the manufacture of cannon, projectiles, gunpowder, &c. it is believed, will lead to improvement in this branch of instruction.

We are also informed that an arrangement has been made for a supply of horses required for a field battery, which will render the exercises with field pieces more perfect.

The instructor of the artillery department is taken from the line of the army, and stationed temporarily at the academy. This situation is not, we understand, peculiarly desirable to an officer of the line, and while held by him precludes him from staff appointments, which are generally attended with increased rank and emolument.—These circumstances would seem to indicate the propriety of instituting a regular and permanent professorship for this important, if not the most important, branch of the military art. The practice and policy of other countries, particularly England and France, and the greatest pains are taken to improve the artillerists, on the suggestion we have made on this subject. In addition to the instruction given in artillery at this institution, the schools in those countries pursue a practical course, occupying about two years, during which every thing is taught relative to the preparation and application of the materials of war, and to the use of every kind of ordnance and military machine required in constructing, defending and attacking fortifications. The object of this practical course is to render the officer and soldier quite familiar with the duties they may be called on to perform in all conceivable emergencies.

To supply, in some degree, the deficiencies necessarily resulting from the want of such a practical course, a collection of models of the various kinds of cannon, projectiles, gun-carriages, military implements and machines, which might be obtained without much expense, would be of essential service. They might be used in the lecture room, and so explained, even in the absence of practice, as to leave a lasting impression on the mind.

The department which, in the official register of the institution, comprehends geography, history and duties, is under the care of a professor and an assistant professor; the former being also the chaplain of the academy; and the latter an artillery officer, selected from the army of the United States. These professors also instruct in constitutional and international law, and in rhetoric and English grammar.

The proficiency of the cadets in this department was of unequal character in all the different branches belonging to it; but, as a general remark, it may be stated that their acquisitions have been as extensive as could be expected during the short portions of time which they have been enabled to devote to these various branches of knowledge, some of which, (constitutional and international law), have been but recently introduced into the course of study. We feel obliged to add, however, that no examination was had in history, no instruction having yet been specifically given in that study; the whole time of the cadets having hitherto been otherwise occupied.

Connected with some of the subjects assigned to this department, we cannot omit to state, emphatically, that it has not yet been found practicable to give any instruction expressly in English composition; a deficiency which, in our opinion, most urgently calls for remedy. The education of young men who are destined to serve in the capacity of officers, cannot be deemed complete without an exact knowledge of their own language, and this is to be acquired only by the practice of composition.

In the department of the French language, the cadets attend recitations of an hour daily, five days in the week, during the first year of their connexion with the academy; and, in the next year, three days in each week. In the higher classes of the last two years, the language is not taught, but the instruction received by the cadets during the preceding two years, together with their private reading, and the constant use of, and frequent reference to, French books, in their daily studies, have a tendency to preserve a sufficient knowledge of, and familiarity with, the language; but they have not the requisite facilities of learning to converse with ease and fluency in it.

A knowledge of the principles and skill in the art of drawing, is an acquisition important in its relation to every branch of science, and especially those connected with the duties of an officer of the army. In this department some improvements have been made within the last year, which appear to be judicious, and cannot fail to be highly advantageous to the students. Instruction is given in drawing during the second and third years of the academic course. The cadets acquire a knowledge of the elements of this science, and attend, successively, to the delineations of the human figure, to landscapes, with the pencil and India ink, to topography; and, finally, they acquire a knowledge of light, shade and coloring.

The room at present appropriated to the instructions in drawing, possesses many advantages over the one formerly used for the purpose, in regard to size, the distribution of light, and other conveniences.

We were much gratified in perceiving that a common room, 75 by 22 feet, is now fitting up for the exhibition of drawings and painting of those cadets who have distinguished themselves in this department; and that excellent illustrations of light, shade and coloring, are prepared to be placed in the panels of this room for the instruction of the student. The latter is the result of the laudable industry of the present professor, executed during his leisure hours.

The examinations upon mathematics were thorough and impartial. They gave the most convincing proof of the diligence and application of the cadets, and exhibited an accurate and minute acquaintance with the different branches of mathematical science. In the oft-repeated charge that more time than is requisite is devoted to the study of mathematics, we cannot concur. The course, when compared with that in other institutions of our country, it is true, is more comprehensive and thorough; but, mathematics being the basis upon which military education must be founded, the course here is sufficiently limited, and could not be shortened without failing, to a certain extent, in obtaining the objects contemplated by the establishment of this institution. In truth, it is so interwoven with the whole course of studies, that it could not be altered without a change in almost every other department.

In natural philosophy and astronomy the cadets performed the demonstrations with facility, and responded to the questions proposed with great accuracy. It was very evident that analysis had not been pursued as an ingenious speculation of abstractions, but as revealing the laws that govern the phenomena of nature, and as confirming their truth.

In this department, the only change, within the last year, has been the introduction of a new work upon optics, prepared by the professor of natural philosophy. This work is more in unison with the scientific pursuits of the country than the one previously used; and the accurate knowledge and familiar acquaintance of the cadets with all the laws and properties of light, were the strongest recommendations of its utility, and its admirable adaptation to the ends for which it had been introduced.

During the last year, the philosophical apparatus has been removed from the hotels, where it had been temporarily placed, to a room in the new building, and neatly arranged. This room is, however, in many respects, unsuited for it; and it is proposed to remove it, as soon as practicable, to a building now in the course of construction, in which better facilities will be afforded for the study of practical astronomy. The additions made to the apparatus, during the last year, have been such as have been demanded by the onward progress of science. They are valuable, and have placed at the command of the professor more effectual means for thorough instruction in this department. We would recommend that every facility should be afforded for instruction in practical astronomy, a branch of knowledge of essential importance and value to the civil engineer; and, the more certainly to secure this object, we would also suggest that there should be added a large transit instrument, a mural circle, and an equatorial stand for the large telescope at present belonging to the collection of astronomical instruments.

The department of chemistry, mineralogy and geology, has, within the last year been placed upon a proper basis, by the creation of a distinct professorship of these branches.

The apparatus in this department is in good condition, but scarcely commensurate in extent with the demands of a science, the rapidity of whose progress is unceasing, and whose continued progress calls constantly for new instruments of illustration and research.

In connection with this department, we cannot forbear to ask the attention of the government to the importance of more ample provision for the pursuit of the sciences of geology and mineralogy—sciences now deemed indispensable to a proper knowledge of the numberless materials which nature has destined to be subjected to the practical operations of the military and civil engineer, and which, with some preparatory study at the academy, might be successfully pursued by military officers during those intervals of leisure which are generally to be found when an army is not engaged in the active duties of war. It is a well known fact that in Europe, particularly in England, the extensive cabinets of geology have been enriched, and the progress of the natural sciences has been essentially aided, by the invaluable contributions which have been made from all parts of the globe by well educated officers of the army. In our own country, the incalculable importance of geological science has been loudly proclaimed by the public voice, in the numerous geological surveys which have been ordered by the legislatures of various states in the union; and the scientific knowledge which intelligent officers might obtain by means of a geological cabinet, embracing a full suite of European as well as American specimens, would enable them to render essential service to their country, not only by the direct practical results of science, but by the no less important advantage of establishing a solid and lasting national reputation.

Among the direct and incidental advantages of this institution, is the diffusion of knowledge on the subject of engineering, in its connection with the art of war, causes it to be highly regarded not only as an important, but a necessary object of attention, and we were highly gratified to perceive that it here receives due consideration. The examinations in this branch of instruction reflected much credit upon the cadets. Its direct utility, in a military point of view, is too obvious for remark. In constructing fortifications and fortified camps, and in improving harbors upon the sea coasts and the shores of our extensive lakes and rivers, for the benefit of internal and external commerce, the government has had, and will continue to have, occasion to employ a large number of skillful engineers; and its main reliance, in this respect, has been upon the graduates in this institution. The successful progress of the extensive works of internal improvements, in almost every section of the United States, undertaken not only by the several states, but by companies and individuals, is, in no inconsiderable degree to be ascribed to the knowledge of engineering which has emanated from this source. The proficiency of the cadets in this department of science is, we think, equal to the highest expectations of the country; and the dissemination of practical and scientific information on this subject, by means of the graduates of this academy, will continue to be, as it has been, of incalculable advantage to the great cause of internal improvement.

The library of the academy, which now contains between eight and ten thousand volumes, is a highly valuable collection, particularly in those departments which relate to military science and the branches of knowledge immediately subsidiary to that science. It is most complete in works on the military, mathematical and physical sciences, and in maps. The deficiencies are most conspicuous in works usually classed under the general head of literature, in contradistinction to science; and among these works it would be desirable that it should be supplied with a body of history, embracing the best translations of the ancient Greek and Roman histories and works of authority on the antiquities of different nations, but especially with a complete collection of the works of authority relative to American history.

We have directed our attention particularly to the fiscal concerns of this institution. The disbursements of the annual appropriations for this service are made by the quartermaster, under the authority, and with the approbation of the superintendent. An examination of the books and accounts of this department has satisfied us that its duties have been strictly and faithfully performed.

The annexed statement, A, exhibits a balance of $53,227 24 remaining of the appropriation for 1838, unexpended on the first of January last. In addition thereto $49,497 09 were appropriated for the year 1839. These two sums making $102,724 33, constitute the available funds on hand at the commencement of the present year, and are applicable to the payment of the current expenses of this institution for 1839. It is further seen, from the statement and paper B, that of the latter sum, there were expended during the first quarter ending 31st of March 1839, 9,453 24, and from the last allotted period to the 31st May, the further sum of $14,365 11 has been disbursed.

By reference to documents A, B, and C, accompanying this report, it will be discovered that of the sum of $102,724 33 on hand, and appropriated for 1839, about the sum of $1,000 is specially applicable to the erection of buildings and additions to the several departments connected with the military academy, and constitutes no part of the ordinary expenses of the institution. When these buildings and additions (some of which are now in progress) shall have been completed, the annual appropriations will be greatly diminished. To a statement made by the superintendent, submitted to paper A, we would refer as part of this report.

The sum annually required for the support of the military academy, is estimated by the superintendent, exclusive of the pay of officers and cadets, amounts to about $22,000.

In connection with this subject, we have under consideration, the books and accounts of the paymaster's department, which appears to have been ably, accurately and neatly kept. It is here the accounts of the cadets are audited. Every attention necessary for the protection of their interests seems to have been bestowed in this department. Every article necessary to their comfort and convenience is furnished at the public store, with the approbation of the superintendent; the price of every article is regulated and fixed by the "board of inspectors," and when delivered, is charged to each cadet, who is required to keep an account of his own expenses. By this system the rights of the cadets are protected; frauds and impositions prevented; a wholesome restraint upon extravagance is imposed, and the principles of economy enforced.

We have, so far, but incidentally alluded to individuals officially attached to the establishment, as the subject required a reference to them.

The military, responsible and highly important duties of the superintendent of the academy, require a superior order of qualifications in the individual selected for this distinguished station.—The comprehensive views, the active energy, the inflexible determination, the rigid and unbending impartiality, blended with a due share of paternal solicitude—all which are indispensable to the full and adequate discharge of this elevated trust—are, in our judgment, conspicuous in the character and conduct of the present commandant of the post.

The distinguished ability, eminent acquirements, persevering industry, and laudable zeal of the professors and instructors, in all the departments, have been brought in the strongest manner to our observation while in the performance of our duty as official visitors; and we are gratified to have an opportunity of bearing our testimony to reputations so well deserved and so honorably acquired. Under the best system of instruction, the surest reliance of the country is on the qualifications and fidelity of those by whom it is administered. Here no pupil is permitted to continue in a class who cannot reach a certain standard, and no compromise is allowed between the salutary results of the utmost exertion of which each cadet is capable, and the absolute necessity of retiring from the institution.

All of which is respectfully submitted by your obedient servants,

OFFICIAL.

GENERAL ORDERS, No. 28.
Head quarters of the army, adjutant general's office,
Washington, July 3, 1839.

1. Promotions and appointments in the army of the United States, since the publication of the official Army Register, in February 1839, and "general orders," No. 15, of February 13.

General staff.

First lieutenant James H. Prentiss, 1st artillery, to be assistant adjutant general, with the brevet rank of captain of cavalry, 24th May, 1839, vice Turner resigned.

First lieutenant William S. Ketchum, 6th infantry, to be assistant quartermaster, with the rank of captain, 28th of February, 1839, vice L'Engle resigned.

First lieutenant James H. Stokes, 1st artillery, to be assistant quartermaster, with the rank of captain, 21st May, 1839, vice Washington resigned.

Zina Pitcher, late surgeon, to be assistant surgeon, 2d February, 1839.

Erastus B. Wolcott, late assistant surgeon, to be assistant surgeon, 12th June, 1839.

James W. Russell, of New York, to be assistant surgeon, 22d June, 1839.

Henry H. Sleimer, of Pennsylvania, to be assistant surgeon, 22d June, 1839.

John C. Glen, of South Carolina, to be assistant surgeon, 22d June, 1839.

Henry E. Crutenden, of New York, to be assistant surgeon, 22d June, 1839.

Corps of engineers.

First lieutenant Charles H. Bigelow, to be captain, 16th June, 1839, vice Eliason, deceased.

Second lieutenant P. G. T. Beauregard, to be 1st lieutenant, 16th June, 1839, vice Bigelow, promoted.

RANK.

1. Cadet Isaac J. Stevens, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

2. Cadet Robert Q. Butler, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

3. Cadet Henry W. Halleck, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

4. Cadet Jeremy F. Gilmer, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

5. Cadet Henry L. Smith, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Corps of topographical engineers.

7. Cadet George Thom, to be brevet 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Ordnance department.

8. Cadet Franklin D. Callender, to be brevet 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

First regiment of dragoons.

26. Cadet Charles Wickliffe, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

23. Cadet Edgar B. Gaither, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Second regiment of dragoons.

27. Cadet Thomas Hutton, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

31. Cadet John H. Hill, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

First regiment of artillery.

Second lieutenant Wm. H. Fowler, to be 1st lieutenant, 1st May, 1839, vice Hale, deceased.

Second lieutenant Isaac S. K. Reeves, to be 1st lieutenant, 21st June, 1839, vice Batts, resigned.

6. Cadet Michael S. Culbertson, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

10. Cadet Joseph A. Haskin, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

11. Cadet Henry D. Grafton, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

13. Cadet Alexander R. Lawton, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

16. Cadet James B. Ricketts, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

21. Cadet Wm. S. Smith, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

22. Cadet S. K. Dawson, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Second regiment of artillery.

Second lieutenant John Sedgwick, to be 1st lieutenant, 19th April, 1839, vice Conklin, deceased.

Second lieutenant William Armstrong, to be 1st lieutenant, 1st June, 1839, vice Morgan, resigned.

15. Cadet Lucius H. Allen, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

19. Cadet Henry J. Hunt, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

23. Cadet Augustus A. Gibson, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Third regiment of artillery.

First lieutenant Martin Burk, to be captain 1st December, 1838, vice L'Engle resigned.

Second lieutenant James M. Ketchum, to be 1st lieutenant, 1st December, 1838, vice Burk promoted.

Second lieutenant William H. Shover, to be 1st lieutenant, 1st March, 1839, vice Casey resigned.

9. Cadet Henry S. Burton, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

12. Cadet James L. Rankin, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

14. Cadet Henry B. Judd, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

17. Cadet Edward O. C. Ord, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

18. Cadet Joseph B. Boyd, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Fourth regiment of artillery.

20. Cadet William Irvin, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

First regiment of infantry.

1st lieutenant J. R. B. Gudenier, to be captain, 11th June, 1839, vice Mitchell deceased.

2d lieutenant John H. King, to be 1st lieutenant, 2d March, 1839, vice Stuart resigned.

2d lieutenant Robert S. Ganger, to be 1st lieutenant, 14th March, 1839, vice Bunnett resigned.

2d lieutenant Alexander W. Reynolds, to be 1st lieutenant, 11th June, 1839, vice Gardener promoted.

2d lieutenant F. S. Mumford, to be 1st lieutenant, 11th June, 1839, vice McAlister resigned.

21. Cadet Eleazer Paine, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

25. Cadet Garrett Berry, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

29. Cadet William H. Korn, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

George W. Wallace, of Pennsylvania, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Alexander Vaughn, of Virginia, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Second regiment of infantry.

1st lieutenant, Amos B. Eaton, to be captain, 1st March, 1839, vice Russel killed.

1st lieutenant Silas Casey, to be captain, 1st July, 1839, vice Bradley resigned.

2d lieutenant M. R. Patrick, to be 1st lieutenant, 1st March, 1839, vice Eaton promoted.

2d lieutenant William Aburtis, to be 1st lieutenant, 1st July, 1839, vice Casey promoted.

30. Cadet Edward R. S. Canby, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

J. W. Martin, of Virginia, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Third regiment of infantry.

1st lieutenant E. B. Babbitt, to be captain, 1st July, 1839, vice Nelson promoted.

2d lieutenant, Widom Martin, to be 1st lieutenant, 1st July, 1839, vice Babbitt promoted.

Vernon H. Lindenberger, of Louisiana, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Fourth regiment of infantry.

Theo. H. Porter, of Pennsylvania, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Sidney Smith, of Virginia, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Fifth regiment of infantry.

Major James S. McIntosh, of the 7th infantry, to be lieutenant colonel, 1st July, 1839, vice Burbank resigned.

1st lieutenant, Robert E. Clary, to be captain, 3d April, 1839, vice Lacy deceased.

2d lieutenant William Root, to be 1st lieutenant, 3d April, 1839, vice Clary promoted.

Robert L. Brooke, of Pennsylvania, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Henry Little, of Maryland, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Sixth regiment of infantry.

Edmund H. Brooke, of Maryland, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Seventh regiment of infantry.

Brevet Major Joseph S. Nelson, captain of the 3d infantry, to be major, 1st July, 1839, vice McIntosh promoted.

2d lieutenant Thomas B. Arden, to be 1st lieutenant, 1st June, 1839, vice Wells resigned.

William B. Greene, of Massachusetts, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Thomas B. Gannett, of Massachusetts, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

John C. Henshaw, of New York, to be 2d lieutenant, 1st July, 1839.

Eighth regiment of infantry.

1st lieutenant William O. Kello, to be captain, 1st May, 1839, vice Denny resigned.

2d lieutenant, John T. Sprague to be 1st lieutenant, 1st May, 1839, vice Kello, promoted.

The 2d lieutenants appointed from civil life will take rank as follows, viz:

1. Theo. H. Porter, 4th infantry.
2. W. B. Greene, 7th infantry.
3. Robert L. Brooke, 5th infantry.
4. George W. Wallace, 1st infantry.
5. Vernon H. Lindenberger, 3d infantry.
6. Thomas B. Gannett, 7th infantry.
7. Edmund H. Brooke, 6th infantry.
8. Sidney Smith, 4th infantry.
9. Henry Little, 5th infantry.
10. J. W. Martin, 2d infantry.
11. John C. Henshaw, 7th infantry.
12. Alexander Vaughn, 1st infantry.

Dates of commissions changed by and with the advice and consent of the senate.

Major Rufus L. Baker, of the ordnance, to rank from 6th July, 1838, instead of the 7th.

Major Man Page Lomax, of the ordnance, to rank from 7th July, 1838, instead of the 9th.

Major James W. Ripley, of the ordnance, to rank from the 7th July, 1838, instead of the 9th.

II—CASUALTIES. (26.)

Resignations. (17.)

Lieutenant colonel. (1.) Sullivan Burbank, 5th infantry, 30th June, 1839.

Captains. (5.) Henry S. Turner, as assist. adj. gen. 16th April, 1839.

John M. Washington, as assist. quartermaster, 11th April 1839.

David Perkins, 1st dragoons, 2d Feb. 1839.

John Bradley, 4th infantry, 30th June, 1839.

St. Clair Denny, 8th infantry, 30th April, 1839.

1st Lieutenants. (8.) Benjamin S. Roberts, 1st dragoons, 28th January, 1839.

Wm. H. Batts, 1st artillery, 20th June, 1839.

Edwin W. Morgan 2d artillery, 31st May, 1839.

Thomas Casey, 3d artillery, 28th Feb. 1839.

Richard Bennet, 1st infantry, 13th March, 1839.

James McAlister, 1st infantry, 10th June, 1839.

Alexander H. Stuart, 1st infantry, 1st March, 1839.

James M. Wells, 7th infantry, 31st May, 1839.

2d Lieutenant (1.) Thomas W. Thompson. 2d dragoons, 30th April, 1839.

Assistant surgeons. (2.) Benjamin F. Fellows, 30th May, 1839.

From the Sprink (No.) Standard.

The citizens of Springfield leaning on the evening of the 30th ult. that this distinguished individual would be in town on the following morning, immediately adopted means to prepare for his reception. Notwithstanding the few hours' notice of his intended visit, a large and respectable number of our citizens were soon collected, who marched out and intercepted him about five miles from this place. After a warm and hearty salutation, the company turned and escorted him to town, where he was received with universal gladness.

Prompted by an anxiety to give an exhibition of their esteem for their worthy, long tried and faithful representative, our citizens immediately resolved to tender him a public dinner. Accordingly a meeting was called for the purpose of appointing a committee to make known this desire, and the following persons were selected: Messrs. John P. Campbell, N. R. Smith, R. A. James, R. K. Payne, W. B. Chapman, Thos. R. Hunt, C. A. Haden, Cyrus Stark, Chas. S. Yancey, J. T. Campbell and E. D. McKenney.

The following correspondence occurred between the committee and col. Benton, a copy of which has been handed to us for publication.

Springfield, 31st May, 1839.

Str: The citizens of Springfield, anxious to avail themselves of your present visit to testify their regard for your numerous and valuable services, respectfully tender to you a public dinner, to be given at such time as may suit your convenience.

We take this occasion to express our entire approbation, (and we believe it to be the almost unanimous sentiment of the people of the southwest), of your long tried services in the council of the national legislature—of your firm, consistent and undeviating support of the principles of democracy, by adhering to her cause when old friends had forsaken it, and when subjects of the most exciting character and pervading interest, convulsed our common country. They well recollect that when pretended friends were deserting, you stood firm by the patriotic president, Jackson, during his administration—an administration transcendently glorious to himself, as well as beneficial to the country. They are also satisfied of your statesmanlike and patriotic support of the interests of the west—the firmness and ability with which you supported that measure, which had for its object the peopling of the "far west" and crowning it with the culture of freemen.

With the hope that the above tender will meet your approbation, we subscribe ourselves respectfully, your obedient and humble servants.

GENTLEMEN: It gives me great pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your kind letter of invitation to a public dinner, and to make my thanks for the flattering terms in which it is expressed; but it has not been my custom to accept public honors of this kind, and in my present tour over the state, it has been my plan to travel in a way to avoid all political excitement and party feeling, and to see the people generally, without form or ceremony, and without regard to political distinctions. I travel to see the people and the country, to learn their wants and their wishes, and to thank them for their past support and favors; and wish to promote an easy intercourse with all that shall do me the honor to make my acquaintance.

On the evening, I think, when we shall be more harmonious than we have been for some years past, and when experience shall prove the utility and wisdom of the great measures of gen. Jackson's administration, and reunite the friends of the country in the support of a common cause. The veto of the national bank charter, and the termination of that institution, was a measure which necessarily divided opinions in a free country, where every citizen was at liberty to think for himself; and the unprecedented efforts which were made, to make people believe that there was not gold and silver enough in the world to supply the place of United States bank notes, and that all debtors must be ruined, all prices laid to nothing, all property be sacrificed, and all labor cease for want of pay—the unparalleled efforts which were made to impress all these gloomy apprehensions on the public mind, were well calculated to distract and alarm the people; and for a time the effort was such as to delude many good citizens. But the season for mistakes and errors and division of opinion, has now passed away, and all must see that the day of the downfall of the national bank, was the day of the upraising of the national prosperity; for, with the exception of the brief intervals of artificial distress and panic, manufactured by the bank and its friends, the increase of the public prosperity has been constant and regular since that day; and now at the end of seven years from the veto we all see that the prices of labor, produce and property are, on an average, about three times as great as they were when we had a national bank, and a federal administration to rule over us. This is a result which every body can see, and about which there can be no dispute; so that the opinion must become general, that the death of that bank was the birth of American prosperity.

This is what general Jackson and his friends foresaw when they commenced their opposition to that bank. They knew that that bank, in addition to being a political machine in the hands of the federalists, was also a moneyed engine of favor to a few and oppression to the many, and systematically working to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. Its great loans were confined to a select few, and these few were the regulators, not of currency, but of prices; they regulated the prices of labor, produce and property; and they fixed the price of every thing to suit themselves, and that was at about one-third of its value. The breaking down of the favoritism and monopoly of that bank—stopping its enormous loans to a select few—stopping its transportation of our specie to Philadelphia and thence to Europe—with a revival of the gold currency, and the increase of our specie from twenty millions to about one hundred millions, these are the true causes of our present gratifying prosperity, and every friend to the liberty and prosperity of the country should now see the propriety of keeping down a national bank and keeping up a circulation of gold and silver. Nor is it sufficient to keep down a national bank; the local banks should also be kept in subordination to the laws. They should be prevented from stopping and suspending when they please, and from inundating the country with small notes, and post notes, and other pestiferous trash. The richest countries in the world, such as Holland, the Hanseatic towns, Cuba, &c. have no paper money at all. France has none under one hundred dollars, and England has none under twenty-five dollars; and all these countries, especially France and the latter, have the most overflowing abundance of gold and silver, not only enough for all their own uses, but to lend to all foreign nations, and that at the low rate of four or five per cent. per annum. Missouri can have as much gold and silver as any of these countries by following the example. I would myself banish all paper money under one hundred dollars; but twenty is the highest mark to which the Democratic party has yet come; and I shall hope to see the next legislature of Missouri act up to that mark, and save the state from the degradation, loss and misery of losing a specie circulation, and becoming the receptacle of all the small trash, all the depreciated stuff, and all the broken bank notes of the surrounding states and territories. The present paper system of the United States cannot stand, even if there was no pecuniary or political object in blowing it up every three or four years. A thousand banks, issuing small notes and post notes, and doing business upon each other's paper, could not stand even if all hands were in favor of saving them; but this is not the case; many are in favor of periodical explosions of the banks, both for pecuniary and political objects, and especially to cause a resuscitation of the national bank; and these will accelerate the event which would come of itself in a few years; and thus periodically afflict the country with a broken bank currency. Our state legislature can save the state from this affliction, and congress can save the federal government.

Our state legislature can save the state by excluding all paper money under twenty dollars; (I had much rather say under one hundred); congress can save the general government by establishing the independent treasury system. This latter measure is now a permanent object of the administration, and is called for by the strongest reasons of policy and necessity. Hard money payments to and from the federal government, and the keeping of its own money by its own agents, (which are the two essential features of the independent treasury), are indispensably necessary to save the federal government from bankruptcy every time the local banks shut up or blow up; also to prevent such banks from expanding their currency upon the credit of the federal government; also to keep up a sufficient quantity of gold and silver in the United States to make it safe not to have any banks at all, and to prevent an exclusive circulation of paper money; also to prevent the resuscitation of a national bank. The democracy of the union are now nearly united in support of this great measure; and, if not established soon, the next explosion of the independent states will do the business. I look upon the establishment of the independent treasury system as an event which, sooner or later, must take place; but it may be that another "suspension" must be added to the argument before it can be carried.

You speak in exalted terms, gentlemen, of the benefits of general Jackson's administration; and well you may, for never has any country improved and advanced as much in the same length of time as ours has done since his elevation to the presidency. At home and abroad prosperity and honor have been accumulating upon the country since that day. According to the predictions of his opponents, every species of evil was to result from his election; according to the fact, every species of good has ensued from it. According to these predictions, we were to have wars with all Europe, a military tyranny at home, and the ruin of all domestic industry. On the contrary, we have had peace with all the world, trade with all nations on the best of terms, and compensation made to our citizens by many nations to the amount of seven millions of dollars, for spoiliations committed on them under former presidents. Instead of a military despotism established on the ruins of a republic, we have now the same constitution that we had before; and we have it better understood, better observed, and better guaranteed by the increased intelligence and vigilance of the people, and the increased responsibility of public servants. Instead of the ruin of domestic industry, we have more industry, and a better reward for labor, than we ever had before. Such were the predictions; such are the facts; and it will now belong to the page of history to record the error of the one and the truth of the other, and to present the administration of general Jackson as the most transcendently glorious and universally beneficial which ever blessed any portion of the human race.

It is not possible, within the limits of this brief letter, to enumerate, even by name, all the great measures which have signalized and illustrated the administration of general Jackson, and blessed and benefited the country; but who can forget the payment of the national debt, the abolition of duties on near fifty millions of imports, and his earnest recommendation to congress to abolish the tax on salt, and give to the country the free, cheap and plentiful use of that article of universal and prime necessity, without which neither man nor beast can take his daily food in health and comfort? Who can forget the indemnities, sent over in gold, to the amount of so many millions, from France, Spain, Denmark, Naples and Portugal? Who can forget the gold bill, which had been dead for thirty years, and which has already given us near thirty millions of that coin, being nearly three times the average annual amount of the notes circulated by the late United States bank? Who can forget the silver bill, which legalized the circulation of foreign silver, and has replenished the country with silver?

Who can forget the veto of the bank charter, which killed the vampire which was sucking the life-blood from the south and west—which broke the machine which was governing our elections—and which destroyed the "regulator," which was enabling a few favorites to "regulate" the price of all produce, labor and property, and to take every thing at the one-third of what they now have to pay for it? Who can forget the removal of the Indians, which freed all the southern and western states from the incumbrance of a useless population, threw open a vast and fertile region to the production of cotton, and thereby created a new market for all the produce of the more northern states, for all their manufacturers, and new employment for the shipping of the northeastern states? Who can forget the recommendation to graduate the price of the public lands, to give preference to settlers, and to sell the lands, not with a view to screw money out of the people; but with a view to promote the settlement, and to increase the cultivation and improvement of the country? Who can forget the most wise and patriotic treasury order of 1836, which instantly operated as a pre-emption law in favor of settlers, and which had the same effect upon the speculators who were then monopolizing the public lands (with the paper of banks which were going to stop payment) that the discharge of a blunderbuss would have upon a flock of blackbirds on a wheat stack? Who can forget these measures, and so many others, all tending to promote the peace and prosperity, and by virtue of which the wealth of the country has been doubled in a few years, the market prices of staple productions have been trebled in many instances; and the laboring man, whether bond or free, is multiplied into three such men, in point of profitable production, as he was when we had a national bank and a federal administration? Who can forget or deny these things? But let us look forward. The repeal of the salt tax, the graduation of the price of the public lands, and the passage of a new pre-emption law, are three great measures which you are now to expect from the congress of the United States; and such is my opinion of the justice and equity of each of these measures, and such my confidence in the eventual success of all that is right, that I fully count upon seeing them all adopted, and beholding the day when you will get the best of salt at three bits for the measured bushel at the river towns; when every settler will be protected in his improvement from the day he makes it; and when inferior lands will be sold for a price adapted to their quality. You also want laws to preserve and protect the permanent circulation of gold and silver among you; and that is a case in which congress can aid you by establishing the independent treasury; and it is a case in which, without the aid of congress, or of any other state, you can help yourselves, by the easy and simple process of excluding all small paper and all depreciated paper from the state.

I am greatly gratified, gentlemen, with my visit to your quarter of the state. It was the last to be settled, because longest encumbered by an Indian population. For a long time it was a sealed book to the people of the other parts of the state; but the removal of the Indians has opened the book, and displayed to view its fair and ample pages; and already the southwest quarter of Missouri is known to a great distance, and is attracting an immense emigration. Taken in its full extent as embracing the valley of the Osage river, part of the waters of the Gasconade, and that fertile region of which the Ozark mountain (as this beautiful table land is called) is the centre; taking your section of the state in this extent, and viewing its various resources and capabilities—its lead and iron ores, pineries and other timbers, its happy mixture of prairie and woodland, its various fertile soil, both valley and upland, its matchless supply of the purest water, its double facilities for navigation by the Missouri and Arkansas waters, its exact adaption to stock-raising, and the unquestioned salubrity of its climate; viewed under all these aspects, and your quarter of the state rises to a high degree of consideration, and merits the day which it will occupy in importance with either of the other three quarters of the far-famed, justly-famed and transcendently favored state of Missouri. To all these natural advantages there is one other of an adventitious, and, perhaps, temporary character, which you at present enjoy, and I hope may long be blessed with—and that is, that there is no bank within upwards of a hundred miles of you, and that you have a more plentiful supply of gold and silver currency at this day, than any bank-ridden portion of the union has even of paper money.

Respectfully, gentlemen, your friend and fellow citizen,

THOMAS H. BENTON.

CHRONICLE.

Light houses and light boats in the U. States. From a schedule accompanying a report of one of the departments, published by the Army and Navy Chronicle, we find that the number of light houses and beacons in the United States, on the 1st January, 1838, was—in Maine, 27—New Hampshire, 4—Massachusetts, 39—Rhode Island, 10—Vermont, 1—Connecticut, 10—New York, 30—New Jersey, 1—Pennsylvania, 23—Delaware, 7—Maryland, 1—Virginia, 7—North Carolina, 7—South Carolina, 3—Georgia, 3—Ohio, 12—Mississippi, 4—Florida, 3—Michigan, 7—Alabama, 2—Louisiana, 3.

White number, 205—light boats, 23.

Improved light for light houses. Since the 1st of April, the lamps which are used in the lantern of the Boston light house, have been filled with other material than oil. We understand that a gentleman of this city has discovered a mode of manufacturing a combustible liquid, which will burn more brilliant than oil—and which emits no smoke or gas—and, of course, whenever it is used, there is no necessity to clean the glasses—and the light will be as brilliant at four o'clock in the morning, as at eight o'clock in the evening. We learn that he has made a proposal to the government, to furnish material for lighting up all the light houses on our coast, with a brighter and more uniform light, than is the case at present, and that an estimate certainly not exceeding what is now paid for oil.

The experiment is now being tried on the Boston light house, and thus far it succeeds admirably—and promises to equal in excellence all that is claimed by the inventor. It is not likely, however, that any change will take place along our coast until the experiment is fully and fairly tested. [Boston Mercantile Journal.]

An appalling incident. On the 4th inst. a collection of citizens had assembled at Moak's Hollow, in the town of Sharon, to celebrate the day. While a party was promoting the street, led by Henry Horton, who was playing on a violin, a horse attached to a wagon took fright, and passed furiously among them—struck Smith with one of the files of the wagon, which pierced nearly through his body, lifted him up from the ground, and carried him in that wretched condition for several rods with great velocity and coming to a descending part of the road, the horse fell upon the unfortunate victim, and slid a considerable distance down the declivity, mangled him in the most horrid manner. Of the persons in the wagon, one jumped out without injury, and the other was thrown some distance, by passing some obstructions, but received no mortal effect. [Canaloholic Radii.]

Information has been received at Boston from Halifax, stating that the fishing schooners Battle and Hyder Ali had been condemned in the vice admiralty court, for encroaching on the British grounds; and the schooner Sheelard and Mayflower, had been released on paying all expenses.

The Havre packet, which left New York on Tuesday, is supposed to have taken out $300,000 in specie.

The grand jury of the United States circuit court, recently held at Detroit, have made a presentment, in which they express the opinion that English consulars here, have been engaged in contracts to import citizens of that place, by entering into stipulation with them to array themselves against the United States in case of a war with England.

The Upper Canada Herald says, that the British government are about to erect a block-house on Fighting island, which commands both channels of the Detroit river.

The Portland Argus says, that the West India yellow fever is making sad havoc with New England sailors. We have recorded the death of several within a few weeks, of our own townsmen, and of those who reside in our vicinity. The brig Charles Miller, which arrived here yesterday, lost by this terrible disease, before she sailed from Havana, a contract upon the departed citizens of this city—also William Cox, a seaman; and on the passage, Mr. John Cook, of Wakefield, N. H. (a passenger), died July 6th.

Debt of New Grenada. It appears from the late message of the president of New Grenada, that the foreign debt of that republic amounts to $16,554,875, and the domestic debt to about $3,850,000. "As to the foreign creditors," says the message, "although they have a right to demand, not only the payment of back interest, amounting to about $13,417,549, but also that which shall hereafter be due on the amounting to the sum of $93,892 per annum, it is necessary to confess, however painful it may be, that the republic is absolutely unable to discharge in full its extensive obligations; for it must pay in preference to other credits, the expenses necessary to its own existence. If creditors, disregarding their true policy, should exact the amount of the loans and interest, they would compel the republic to declare itself bankrupt." [N. Y. Jour. Com.]

The secretary of state has returned to Washington, from his northern tour.

Admiral Sir Isaac Coffin. The following characteristic letter from the admiral, who is now in his 81st year, is published in a late London paper. "Fear'd I may suddenly 'slip my wind,' and in the hurry of departure, forget to order my bankers to send adieu £100 for the naval school, which has always had my fervent prayers for its success, I herein send the necessary document."

Rhode Island. The friends of the administration in Rhode Island, have nominated Thomas W. Dorr and Benjamin B. Thurston, as their candidates for congress. The whig candidates are Messrs. Cranston and Tillinghast, the late members. The election takes place on the 27th of August.

Mormon troubles in Illinois. The Shelby Republican gives the following version of the difficulties in that county, which it was reported the troops had been called out: "Some of the inhabitants of that county—many of them said to be old residents,—embraced the Mormon faith. These, while pursuing their ordinary avocation, were beset by a mob, and assaults committed upon them. In order to enjoy the equal rights secured by the Breese law, warrants to arrest the offenders. Judge Breese issued warrants against fifteen of the mob, and authorised and directed Col. James W. Vaughan, to call out his regiment to assist in arresting them. The col. ordered out a part of his regiment, but part of his men refused to obey the order, and the mob increasing, the military retreated."

Galvanism. There is now in operation, at No. 53 Gold street, in this city, a machine, propelled by a galvanic battery, on four electro magnets, which furnishes a mechanical power already applicable and useful for many purposes. The motive wheel of this machine is five feet in diameter, weighing four hundred pounds, and the magnets, when under the action of galvanism, causes it to revolve forty or fifty times a minute, for many hours in succession. Nothing can be simpler than the operation of this machine, which is on a plan entirely new, and quite different from that of the machines propelled by this power, which have heretofore been exhibited to the public.

The vivid sparks of electricity which are constantly emitted, while this engine is in motion, bear evidence to the tremendous energy of the power now brought under the control of man for useful purposes of life. No reason can be assigned, we believe, why this power cannot be increased indefinitely. Incalculable benefit would be conferred upon society by the discovery of this new and simple mechanical power, if it were only available from that of a single man, to that of one or two horses, where the employment of steam is dangerous and expensive. We advise the friends of science and the arts to visit this machine, as it may be seen daily in operation, at the place above mentioned. [N. Y. Com.]

We have been furnished with the following statement of the amount of duties paid in this district, for the first quarter of the present year, compared with the same quarter in the last.

It is stated in the New York Gazette, that when the upper deck of the steamboat Sampson fell, on the 4th instant, one of those who were wounded by the accident, placed his worthy doctor, Dr. Wood, a respectable physician of the city, being on board, very fortunately felt the pulse of Mr. Henriques, then supposed to be dead, and discovered that he was alive. The doctor promptly gave the patient some brandy and water, when he began to revive. The crowd then collected around the doctor, and insisted that the patient should be bled. The worthy doctor declined, and told them that he would not commit murder by bleeding; that the patient was too much injured to admit of the loss of any more blood. The silly belief that it was necessary on all occasions of accidents to bleed, led the doctor in bad repute with the passengers, but his judicious treatment of the worthy doctor, saved the gentleman's life. The course pursued by Dr. W. was approved by two of the most eminent surgeons of New York, who held the opinion that had he yielded to the solicitations of the passengers and bled the patient, he could not have survived.

The steamboat Antelope, which left St. Louis some months ago, for the mouth of the Yellow Stone river, was wrecked, having fired to reach her respective destination, by about 400 miles, on account of low water.

The St. Louis papers mention the arrival there, of six hundred tons from the Yellow Stone river, with 24,000 buffalo robes, worth $100,000.

The town of Salem, Mass. with a population of fifty thousand, had only three deaths during the month of June.

There were 145 deaths in Philadelphia last week. The number of deaths in the city of New York, was 164.

In Baltimore, the number was 53.

The Cincinnati Republican cautions its city readers against purchasing butter and cheese brought to that market, without first being assured that they are not infected with the poison from the weed that causes what is known in that quarter, as the milk sickness.

Trade of the west. The Cincinnati Daily News states that from the 12th of January, to the 8th of July, of the present year, there have been 1,770 steamboat arrivals at that city—one-fourth of the number being boats of the largest class.

At one of the celebrations of the fourth, in Virginia, the following good 'un was handed in and drank. Judge Lynch: If ever found within the limits of the Old Dominion, he shall assuredly have a trial by jury—his own code to the contrary notwithstanding.

Air—Rogues march. The Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore rail road company, has declared a half yearly dividend of four per cent. payable on the 1st of August.

Exploring expedition. The Journal of Commerce publishes a letter from Guayaquil, under date of 21st May, which says—"By the Gorafilia, in the remarkable short passage of 14 days from Valparaiso, I have learned of the arrival of a part of the exploring expedition, viz.—the Peacock and Relief.

A letter from Havana, in the Journal of Commerce, states that the government of Cuba has offered to sell or rent the rail road from Havana to Gair's Bay, thirty-two miles long, for the sum of $3,000,000. The government will give it for $2,000,000. Since last December, it has taken upwards of $1,000 per day for freight and passengers, and it might be made still more profitable, as the country through which it passes will grow daily more populous.

Affecting scene. The funeral of the unfortunate seaman, named Remsen, one of the crew of the North Carolina, who was murdered on Friday night, which took place on Saturday, was a most interesting and imposing spectacle we have noticed for many a day.

After the ceremonies were over, preparations were made to remove the body to its last resting place, when, as it was borne out of the house, it was followed immediately by two elegy-men, and next in order, about 200 persons, who, as they passed, sang the following on board the North Carolina. They were all dressed neat and trim, in white pantaloons, white stockings and pumps, a blue jacket and tarpanlin hat. They walked two and two, all perfectly sober, and inent upon the melancholy duty they were performing. As the mournful procession passed through the street in solemn array, we observed that the deceased, his fellow sufferers and imposing spectacles we have noticed for many a day.

An editor killed in an affray. J. W. Moore, esq. editor of the Red River Whig, was killed in the street of Alexandria, Va. on the 1st July, by King Holstein. Moore had previously been challenged by Holstein, but refused to fight him on the ground that he was not a gentleman. This expatriated H. to such a degree that he armed himself with a gun and brace of pistols, waited for Moore in the street, and in the first place snapped his gun at him. That missing fire, he drew a pistol and shot him dead.

Shot men afterwards walked through the town and made his escape, the sheriff being afraid to arrest him. [N. O. Picayune.]

Court of common pleas—unprecedented. The many well founded and grievous complaints of "the law's delay," would soon cease, if law courts generally could get through their business with such despatch as did the court of common pleas of this city, during the last term. Every case on either the argument or trial side, was heard and disposed of in the respective courts, litigants had an opportunity, if willing or prepared, to try their causes. This we believe, is altogether an unprecedented occurrence in the annals of any of our law courts. [N. Y. Jour. Com.]

The only two surviving "life guards" of Washington, were in the procession on the fourth of July, in Newburgh. Their names are Benjamin Eaton and Robert Blair. On entering the church, they were respectively addressed by the Mayor, by six other revolutionary soldiers—the mixed ages of all being 551 years.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

THE foreign news published in the present sheet is of great interest, indicating as it does a great and disastrous revolution in the commercial relations of this country with England, in which our merchants and planters will be the principal sufferers; England it will be seen is also distracted by the movements of a new and powerful political party,—and there is a speck of war in the east, which some think indicative of a general war in Europe. We refer our readers to the details from which they can form their own conclusions.

THE PRICE OF COTTON. In June last we published a private "cotton circular" which was distributed, erroneously, to the bank of the United States, the object of which was to keep up the price of cotton in the European markets. In the present sheet we have published another circular, issued about the same time, and for the same object, but which has only recently been made known to the public through the columns of the Macon Telegraph, in which the plan is detailed at some length, and a convention proposed to be held in Macon, in Georgia, to carry it into effect. As an appendix to that circular, we have also published in the present sheet, the manifesto of the Manchester cotton spinners, in which the plan proposed, tho' only known to the parties to a limited extent, is denounced as "one of the most rash and insane speculations of modern times."

THE ENGLISH NEWS has had a most depressing effect upon the New York market. The following, which we find in the Star, discloses some of the plans devised to counteract the evils which it threatens to the commercial community.

We learn that a committee of gentlemen have called, or are about to call on the banks of this city, with the view of inducing them to ship coin to England, and draw against it, say to the amount of from three to five millions of dollars. It is said that the operation can be carried on with a reasonable profit, selling exchange from nine and three quarters to ten per cent. The idea of sending abroad a portion of our specie has been the subject of conversation for many weeks past in Wall street. It is one of the articles which can now be shipped at a profit.

The demand in London, owing to a present deficiency there, and the over supply in other parts of Europe, and to some extent in this country, will necessarily produce an equalization in the course of trade. The advantage of sending out coin in known and considerable quantities is this: that it will be ascertained sooner, and with greater accuracy when an equalization has taken place, and at once the operation of shipping will be suspended. A different course is likely to result in an unnecessary accumulation of coin in London, from the fact that it will be shipped there from all quarters, with a view to profit, and in amounts unknown, until there shall be an over supply.

We are not sure that the banks ought to be the principals in sending out the coin, because it is out of the line of their ordinary business; but we are sure that they should pay it out to their bill holders and depositors without hesitation or concealment. In this way the quantity going abroad will be known with certainty both here and in London; and shipments will immediately cease as soon as a sufficient supply is furnished there. The supply must be furnished either directly by the banks to their customers, or indirectly through brokers.—See how the matter now works.—A merchant who is under the necessity of making a remittance abroad, being unable to purchase exchange upon satisfactory terms, instead of going to the banks, whose bills he holds, or in which he has money deposited, covertly puts his funds in the hands of a specie broker, with directions to purchase the required amount; and lest he should create ill feeling, he endeavors to keep the fact secret that he is shipping coin. The consequence is that we can neither know here nor can they know with accuracy in England, when their deficiencies are supplied; and shipments will go on long after the necessity of making shipments shall have ceased.

The moment the bank of England finds itself with a surplus of coin on hand, the rate of interest will be forthwith reduced. Cotton will advance in price, American speculators will be firm, and the surplus coin will return to this country. It is after all a mere settlement of balances. England has the gold to-day, and in fifteen days it is back again into the United States. When they are short we send our surplus; when we are short, they send their surplus to us.

MR. CLAY is at present on a visit, for the first time in his life, to the Falls of Niagara, and is expected at Saratoga springs on the 10th of next month. He has every where been received with the most distinguished marks of courtesy. Whilst at Buffalo, though determined to avoid all public display, he was publicly welcomed by a committee on behalf of the citizens. The address of the chairman of the committee and Mr. Clay's reply, are published in the present sheet. He recently crossed over the river at the Falls to witness the parade of the 43d regiment, the colonel of which politely invited him to review it, an honor he declined in favor of his friend general Porter, by whom he was accompanied.

APPOINTMENT BY THE PRESIDENT. William Selden, of Virginia, to be treasurer of the United States, in the place of John Campbell, superseded. Mr. Selden entered upon his official duties on the 22d inst. Mr. S. was a candidate for congress at the recent election in Virginia.

The "Globe," of Monday last, in reply to some statements that Mr. Campbell was removed because he was a conservative, assigns the following as the reasons which actuated the president.

"Some of the indiscreet friends of the late treasurer, Mr. Campbell, are very abusive towards the president on account of his removal. Whether ignorant of the true facts, or fully acquainted with them from him, their course is equally censurable and unjust to impute bad motives to the president, or to assign false causes for the removal. Whether Mr. Campbell is a conservative or not, and whether he is opposed to the president or not, and if so, ought not to be employed under him, are questions not necessary to be discussed on this occasion; because we learn that since Mr. Van Buren's administration commenced, Mr. C. has, from his infirm condition, been absent from his office more than one-third of the whole time. That during the remaining two-thirds of the time he has not been able to attend at all to the correspondence of the office, even so far as to affix his signature to it; and that in respect to the other business, he has omitted entirely to supervise and sign the drafts, treasury notes, &c. after having been filled up for him, but has been in the habit of merely signing blank notes and blank drafts to the amount of millions on millions, leaving them to be afterwards filled up and issued by his clerks, without the slightest interference on his part as the head of the office.

"The president, on ascertaining these facts, undoubtedly considered that Mr. Campbell's infirmities prevented him from devoting that personal attention to his official duties which the laws and the public security render proper.

"For these reasons, and not for the political ones blazoned about by the opposition, we understand that Mr. C. was notified that a change in the office had become necessary.

"So far from proscription or unkindness existing in this case, Mr. C. has, under these circumstances, been treated with marked forbearance and courtesy by the president, and all connected with the administration."

MR. WEBSTER. There are many speculations afloat, whether the above named gentleman, by his late letter to the citizens of Massachusetts, withdrawing himself from before the people as a candidate for the presidency, intended also to decline the nomination, which he has already received for the vice presidency. We answer that we have evidence for saying, he did not. [Gettysburg, Pa. Star.]

COL. JOHNSON. "The impression appears to be very general that the present vice president of the United States will not be a candidate for re-election." [Richmond Enquirer.]

GENERAL ANDREW JACKSON arrived here yesterday, and stopped with his fast friend and fellow soldier, general Armstrong, until this morning, when with him he departed for White's creek springs, accompanied by Judge Catron and others. It affords us sincere pleasure to state, that the health of the venerable ex-president is very much improved. He is expected to return to this city to-morrow. [Nashville Union, July 12.]

THE HON. ABRAHAM VANDERVEER, a representative in the last congress from the state of New York, died at Brooklyn on Sunday last. He was a friend of the administration, a moderate politician and much esteemed for his personal character.

MISSISSIPPI. United States senator R. J. Walker, who had determined to decline a re-election, has, at the instance of the friends of the present administration, consented to offer again. A meeting is called in the Natchez papers by the friends of S. S. Prentiss, to start that gentleman in opposition to Mr. Walker.

MR. FOSTER, OF TENN. In reply to a letter addressed to him, the hon. E. H. Foster, whig senator from Tennessee, elected in the place of Mr. Grundy, states that, in the event of a majority of his political opponents being elected to the state legislature, he will resign his seat. He says:

"What my friends and the public generally may think of this, my intended course, I know not, I have reason to fear that with some people, it may subject me to no inconsiderable censure. However this may be, I trust and hope, that no difference of opinion on the main point will deny my heart the undivided approbation of all. Could I suffer the lust of office to predominate over the pride of sentiment, and the noble and elevated endearments of private life, I should not be without multiplied examples in the highest ranks of consistent democracy, to excuse the pertinacity which might tempt me to cling to a commission long after the instrument had been spoiled of its brightest gem, 'public confidence.' I rebuke not, neither do I envy, those who garnish themselves with such doubtful honors; but my nature and my disposition must undergo a great change before I consent to imitate their example. With me, the private station is the post of honor; whenever I shall become satisfied that my constituents desire to dispense with my services."

NORTH EASTERN BOUNDARY. Among the passengers in the Great Western are col. Mudge and other gentlemen, appointed by the British government as commissioners on the north eastern boundary.

The New York Express says that the newspapers in Canada and the lower provinces have discovered to their consternation that the geologist of the United States has been appointed by the British government to settle the boundary question. The fact seems to be, that Mr. Featherstonhaugh, who has recently made a geological survey for our government in the western states, and returned to England last winter, has received the appointment of geologist to the commission about to be organized for a new survey of the boundary. The New Brunswick papers seem to look upon this as conclusive evidence that the American claim is to be allowed without any trouble.

TEXAS. The dates from Houston are to the 11th inst.

The rumored arrival of four thousand Mexican troops in the vicinity of Matamoros produced some excitement among the people of Texas, who were preparing to meet them and give a good account of them.

A considerable detachment of Texan troops had marched towards the northern frontier, to repel an invasion which the savages threatened in that quarter.

This cotemporaneous movement of the Indians and Mexicans, indicates some kind of combination and concert between them.

We are happy to learn that the indemnity due by the government of Texas to the United States for the seizure of some merchant vessels some years since, was yesterday paid to the honorable Alice LaBrache, in behalf of his government. The amount was something over twelve thousand dollars. [New Orleans Bee.]

MEXICO AND TEXAS. The correspondence which has taken place between colonel Bee, the late Texan envoy of Texas, and general Victoria, the military commandant of Vera Cruz, is published in a number of the Iris, a Mexican paper, on the 22d of June. The instructions from the supreme government in the city of Mexico, required general Victoria not to receive colonel Bee as an agent of Texas. He was required to say to colonel Bee:

1. That he might represent in writing to general Victoria the object of his mission, not in any public character, but as a commissioner from the revolted colonies of Texas.

2. That if the object of his mission was to ask the recognition of the independence of Texas, gen. Victoria should reply that the government of the republic could give no replies, and that colonel Bee should be immediately required to re-embark.

3. That general Victoria should treat colonel Bee altogether as a private individual, but that he should guard his movements, and prevent all communication with the revolutionary spirits.

The secretary of state for the home department should remark that colonel Bee arrived in the United States packet Woodbury, and that the United States consul at Vera Cruz, delivered his communication to general Victoria. These circumstances prove how much interest the United States government and its agents continue to take in the dismemberment of this republic.

In consequence of his instructions, general Victoria required the Texan envoy to re-embark in the first vessel sailing from Vera Cruz. [Globe.

EVENTS IN PERU, BOLIVIA AND CHILI. Extracts from late files of "El Araucano," published at Santiago de Chili.

The province of Potosi, in the republic of Bolivia, has pronounced against the confederation with Peru, and the following declarations have been adopted by the legislature:

1. The Peru Bolivia confederation shall be abandoned, because we lose by it our independence and become a colony of Peru.

2. We repudiate the authority of general Santa Cruz, because he has used his power in a most tyrannical and arbitrary manner, and has arrogated power which was not imparted to him.

3. We nominate general Jose Miguel de Valasco, as president of Bolivia.

4. We declare that Bolivia has not had the slightest part of the crimes of general Santa Cruz, committed at home or abroad.

FROM JAMAICA. By the John W. Carter, at New York, we have files of Kensington, Jamaica, papers to the 27th June inclusive; they contain but little of interest, however, beyond a repetition of the exasperated state of feeling that exist between the present governor, sir Lionel Smith, and his supporters, and the planters of the island.

The governor and the magistrates are charged with conspiring against the general interests of the people, and parson Knabb, who threatened some time since to head a mob of blacks, is still active in his mischief. He has published an article wherein he terms the whites of Jamaica calumniators, thieves, infidels, women-floggers, &c. The governor has prosecuted the editor of the Despatch for a libel, in republishing from the New York Albion, an article cautioning the governor against letting loose the public felons, convicts, &c.

By a recent statement it appears that the island contains 55,000 white inhabitants, 100,000 free colored and 311,000 newly emancipated apprentices. There are 135,000, white and black included, who can vote, and the emancipated are acquiring freeholds giving a decided contradiction to the statement in the house of commons, of there being but 5,600 whites on the island.

The annexed we find in the New York Star: The Jamaica Standard gives alarming accounts of secret meetings of free negroes in Westmoreland, for the purpose of considering the propriety of adopting the desperate course of "fighting for their houses and grounds!" The same paper says that the whites will have to resort to self-defence, as the government has neglected to provide arms and ammunition for the towns. In reviewing matters in Jamaica, we should not be at all surprised to hear of a general massacre of the whites throughout the island, worse than that of St. Domingo. It is very clear that the planters are desperate, seeing themselves plundered and impoverished, and that they would meet death with firmness as a relief to their sufferings.

Sir Lionel Smith is accused of having suppressed important information to the government at home. In evidence to us we find the following report of justice Wills, dated as far back as September 9, 1838, but not despatched by sir Lionel, till January

5, 1839. The report of justice Wills contains this passage:

"It appears scarcely one-third of the late apprentices have returned to their work, and I regret to say they are not performing labor continuously.

"There is only one property where the whole of the late apprentices are at work."

A subject of such excitement at the moment is that of restricting the negroes to limited portions of ground. This the government oppose. A planter writes: "I repeat again, take away their grounds"—that is to say, the grounds where a negro plants corn, cocones, yams, &c. for sale, instead of giving his labor for hire, to make sugar, or the staple commodity of the property he lives on. Leave the negro laborer his house and small garden, with his fruit trees—say one rood, and no more, around his house, and no where else—then he must work for hire, money wages, and his maintenance."

The government party were rejoicing in the anticipation of the passage by parliament, of the Jamaica bill.

THE COURT MARTIAL. We understand that the United States court martial, now in session, in this city, for the trial of major Brant, of the U. S. army, has completed the examination of the testimony on the part of the government, and have entered upon the examination of witnesses on the part of the accused. The major, we are informed, has dispensed with the testimony of one witness in Florida, and we therefore presume that the investigation will be closed sooner than was anticipated.

U. S. MINT AT NEW ORLEANS. The New Orleans Express of the 15th inst. contains the following:

Thomas Sidell, esq. the United States district attorney, left the city on Friday last for Washington, carrying with him the record of an investigation which has been going on, night and day, for more than a month, at the mint, during which many curious facts came to light. Mr. Sidell conducted the investigation on the part of the government, judge Woodruff and Wm. D. Boyle, esq. on the part of some of the other officers.

ILLINOIS. There are, as we learn from the Louisville Journal, two important constitutional questions before the supreme court of Illinois, now in session at Springfield. One is in regard to the tenure of the office of secretary of state, and the power of the governor to appoint where there is no vacancy; in other words, to remove the incumbent at pleasure. The other is whether foreigners not naturalized have the right of voting under the constitution. The latter question comes up under a difficulty growing out of the adoption of the town charter of Galena.

BREAD STUFFS. The Pittsburg Gazette of Monday afternoon states that flour was selling there on that day at $3 50 per barrel. In some parts of Ohio, it is added, wheat had fallen within three or four weeks past from $1 50 down to 75 cents per bushel. At Louisville, it will be seen, wheat was selling at 75 cents, but it was expected to fall to 62½ cents. The certainty of abundant crops has occasioned this great decline in prices.

In the Baltimore market, new wheat continues to come in very sparingly. The supplies do not yet equal the demand, and common to best reds command $1 20 to $1 30 per bushel. The stock of flour of all descriptions in market is considerably under 10,000 barrels. City mills held at $5 50; Howard street, $5 87½. [Balt. Amer. of yesterday.

NEW YORK CANALS. The tolls collected on the New York state canals during the first week in July in each of the five years past are as follows:

1836,	41,495
1837,	30,721
1839,	29,764

Showing an excess in 1839 over 1838 of $1,082, and an excess in 1836 over 1839 of $1,731.

The tolls collected on the New York state canals during the second week in July of each of the five past years are as follows, viz:

1835,	$36,432 06
1836,	48,906 83
1837,	29,421 04
1838,	37,726 71
1839,	32,733 50

WHEAT AND FLOUR. The wheat and flour arriving at the Hudson river in this and the preceding year, during the first two weeks in July, is as follows:

	Bush. wheat.	Bbls. flour.
1838,	34,537	58,846
1839,	8,134	38,800

Showing a falling off of 26,403, and 20,046 Being together equal to a falling off of 25,326 barrels of flour in two weeks.

The total arrival at the Hudson river in this and the preceding year, up to the 14th July, is as follows:

1838,	361,866 bbls. flour.

Showing a falling off of 28,500 " In the arrival at the Hudson river, notwithstanding there was up to the 14th June, an increase of $58,527 barrels in the quantity of wheat and flour coming in at Buffalo from Ohio, Michigan and Illinois, over the former year. [Argus.

FLOUR. The wheat harvest, as far north as Maryland inclusive, is already in; and notwithstanding some local exceptions, particularly in lower Virginia, it is on the whole one of the richest that ever was gathered. There is every prospect of a similar result in Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Michigan, and other grain growing states; so that we may safely calculate upon a large surplus for exportation, and that the price of flour will be regulated by what it is worth for that purpose. This will depend, in part, upon the scantiness or plentifulness of the crops in other countries. By the last accounts, the wheat prospects were good in England, and we have as yet no intimation of short crops any where except in Chili. But at all events, we shall find a demand for flour in the West Indies and South America, which we can supply if we will do it cheap enough; and with reference to the effect on exchanges, it is not material where the flour goes to, if only it goes at all. Notwithstanding the short crops of 1837 and 1838, we exported in the twelve months ending 30th September last, flour to the value of $3,605,299. During the year to come we see not why we cannot export to the value of $10,000,000, unless some unlooked for disaster should befall the crop in the middle and northern states. The effect of this upon our exchanges will be sensibly felt. Added to 1,600,000 bales of cotton (which the next crop will probably realise) it will turn exchanges decidedly in our favor, unless we go to importing too freely, which we are apt to do whenever we begin to feel strong.

When exchanges become favorable, the pressure upon the money market will cease, as there will then be no motive for the exportation of specie, and consequently the banks will be more free than their discounts. [N. Y. Jour. Com.

NEW KIND OF WHEAT. The Charleston, Va. Press says, "a new kind of wheat, of superior quality, and which yields much more abundantly than any hitherto raised in that county, has been secured by the present harvest on the farm of Mr. John Wyson, near Shepherdstown. Mr. W. obtained the seed from Mr. Stonebraker of Maryland, who became in possession of a small quantity by accident, two or three years since. From three bushels and three pecks sown by Mr. W. on ground not the most favorable part of his farm for wheat, he will, it is thought, have a yield of at least 125 bushels—some competent judges say 150 bushels. The heads are very large, and contain many more grains than the heads of wheat now generally grown in Jefferson county. It attracts much attention, and is evidently a new and very superior kind of wheat, well worthy the attention of farmers. In a favorable season, and land not unfavorable to the production of wheat, it is believed, it will always yield from 40 to 50 bushels per acre.

On the above, the Baltimore American remarks:—We have received some additional particulars respecting this new kind of wheat. It is called the rock wheat, from the circumstance, that some two or three years ago a single head of wheat, of peculiarly large size and product was seen growing by itself from the crevice of a rock in a wheat field. The head was carefully preserved and the grain sown, and from it has been produced the few parcels which were sown last year by different gentlemen. Two of these parcels found their way to Baltimore, and on account of their remarkably fine quality and the accompanying assurance of their productive character, were bought for seed at the rate of three dollars per bushel. They were sown in the vicinity of our city early in October last, and we are now enabled to state the result of the experiment as made by one of the gentlemen, Mr. Joel Vickers. Three and a half acres of rich, well prepared ground, have been found to produce at the rate of forty-seven bushels to the acre. The quality of the grain is excellent, and many of the heads were found to contain forty-five grains of wheat. Although it is admitted that, when the character of the land and the favorableness of the season are considered, ordinary grain would have produced a full yield, yet the extraordinary produce, just stated in the case of Mr. Vickers, as well as that quoted from the Charleston Press, proves that the rock wheat is a valuable species, and well merits the notice of wheat growers.

REMAINS OF SOLDIERS OF THE REVOLUTION. From the National Gazette. The graves of several revolutionary soldiers who fell near Philadelphia by the arms of the enemy, were mentioned by us recently in an editorial paragraph, and a suggestion was made of the propriety of collecting the remains of the gallant dead in this vicinity, and erecting a monument to their memory. A correspondent in the annexed letter answers several questions satisfactorily concerning the burial place of certain patriots of '76.

Philadelphia, July 12, 1839.

To the editors of the National Gazette:

Gentlemen: Begging you to excuse an anonymous communication, a reader of your paper of yesterday would respectfully state, that major Witherspoon was buried at Beggstown, (now called Franklinville by its delicate inhabitants), above Germantown, in the grave of the Lutheran church, (St. Michael's), of which the Rev. Mr. Richards is pastor. General Nash was riding at the head of his brigade, and had arrived in front of the grave yard above mentioned, when a ball struck his leg, broke it, and passing on, dashed out the brains of the major, who was acting as his aid. At the middle of that portion of the yard which is in front of the church, about three paces to the left of the gravel walk, (facing towards the church), stands a headstone which bears the following inscription:

Here lies the body of
major JAMES WITHERSPOON, of the Jersey brigade,
who fell in the battle of Germantown,
October 4, 1777.

The writer has been informed by a gentleman now residing in Germantown, to whom the public are indebted for valuable historical contributions, that captain Dwyer, of North Carolina, and major Irvine, lie together with six men, in one grave, at the east corner of the upper burial ground of Germantown, which adjoins the Concord school house.

The following extract is from an article published in the Germantown Telegraph of March 13th, 1839, (credited to the Southern Literary Messenger).
"The remains of this gifted and accomplished soldier (gen. Mercer) now sleep in Christ church yard at Philadelphia. Impelled by filial love, his youngest son, in the year 1817, sought his place of interment. The venerable Mr. Dolby, who had attended the funeral was still the sexton, and assisted in the pious search; and near the grave on the southern side of the brick enclosure were faintly inscribed the letters "G. M." A plain and unadorned marble slab now marks the grave, bearing the simple yet expressive epitaph:
"In memory of gen. Hugh Mercer, who fell at Princeton, January 3d, 1777."

AN OLD SOLDIER. At the celebration of the 4th of July, at Cedarville, Cumberland county, N. J., a short address was delivered by the rev. Mr. Osborn, in which he related many events, with which he was familiar in the revolution while serving his country as private soldier. He spoke of his being in New York on the 4th of July, 1776, and of his hearing in the afternoon the roaring of the cannon from the battery—and the reason assigned for the demonstration of joy was that congress had that day declared "that we were about to be free and independent states." The rehearsal of past dangers and successes seemed to enkindle afresh in this "soldier of the revolution" all the ardor and patriotism of his youthful days.

The rev. Mr. O. is pastor of the Fairfield Presbyterian congregation, and has filled that station, beloved and respected by people of all denominations—in fact we might say by every body—for near half a century. He is, we believe, considerably past three score years and ten, and retains all his mental and bodily faculties to an astonishing degree, and is truly an old soldier. He is one of the few connecting links that bind the present with the past that is yet suffered to remain with us. A few delightful journeys of the resplendent orb of day, and the last link of the chain will be broken.

NAVAL. The U. S. ship Natchez, B. Page, commander, arrived at New York on Tuesday last from a cruise of several years in the West Indies and Gulf of Mexico. The last cruise was among the West India islands. She left Pensacola on the 29th ult. and proceeded as far to the windward as St. Bart's. The Natchez has brought home a number of officers, seamen and marines of the squadron of commodore Shubrick; most of the officers, we believe, have returned for the purpose of facilitating or obtaining their promotion, and most of the seamen and marines in consequence of their terms having expired. List of the officers of the Natchez: Benjamin Page, esq. commander; John D. Wright, 1st lieutenant; J. M. Berrien, 2d do.; A. C. Maury, 3d do.; Stephen Decatur, acting 4th do.; J. D. J. Maston, acting master; George Blackwell, surgeon; Sterret Ransay, esq. purser; J. Thompson Mason, assistant surgeon; midshipmen—N. E. Collins, Mar-rast, Brown, Plantou, Morgan and Bissell; V. Hall, boatswain; John D. Benthall, gunner; J. White-man, sailmaker; E. Leedon, purser's steward.

Passengers—J. Miner, esq. of Virginia; S. Yard, U. S. Navy

Pensacola, July 13. The United States schooner Oscego, lieut. Shubrick, arrived here on Monday last from Key West. The Oscego is one of the small craft fitted out to operate on the Peninsula against the Indians.

In our last was contained a hasty and imperfect notice of the difference in relation to a point of professional etiquette which had occurred between the commanders of the French and American squadrons. As was stated in the article alluded to, after the exchange of national salutes, commodore Shubrick called a visit to the Oscego on board the Verecile. He was not received with the usual salutation of guns, in consequence of which he addressed a note to the admiral, inquiring why he failed to accord to him the honors to which he was entitled as a commander-in-chief. An elaborate correspondence ensued on the subject of etiquette, which was conducted in the most temperate manner, and terminated without producing any unpleasant feelings. We by no means intended, as some persons seem most gratuitously to suppose, to impute any want, on the part of com. Shubrick, of courtesy to the French admiral. On the contrary, we understood at the time that com. Shubrick visited the French admiral not so much with the expectation of receiving the salute which he deemed due to his rank as the commander of an American squadron, as with the determination to leave unperformed no act of courtesy which could possibly be expected of him.

The United States schooner Shark, lieut. com. The Bigelow, bound to the Pacific, went to sea from Hampton Roads on Monday.

A long sixty-eight pound gun, intended to throw Paixhan shot, has been placed on board the United States steam frigate Fulton, for the purpose of making experiments at Sandy Hook

THE NORTH CAROLINA 74. Naval apprentices again. The broad pennant of commodore Ballard was hauled down from the North Carolina yesterday, and the blue pennant of commodore Ridgeley, commander of this station, hoisted in its place. This ship is to be retained at the navy anchorage in our harbor, where she now lies, as a school of practice for naval apprentices, under the direction of captain Gallagher, aided by lieutenant Marshal, (late of the Hudson receiving ship), as executive officer. The last mentioned gentleman has for sometime had the superintendence of the admirable school for apprentices on board the Hudson. The pupils will now be transferred to the North Carolina, which it is believed will accommodate a school of 1,500. What a capital nursery this for young seamen. There will be in time as much competition among families to get admission for their children in this practical navy seminary, as there has been to obtain a cadet's commission in the celebrated military school at West Point.

[N. Y. Star.]

MILITARY ACADEMY. The following are the names of the five most distinguished cadets of the military academy, in their respective classes, as determined at the general examination held at West Point during the month of June, 1839.

First class.

1. Isaac I. Stevens, of Massachusetts.
2. Robert J. Butler, of Virginia.
3. Henry W. Halleck, of New York.
4. Jeremy F. Gilmer, of North Carolina.
5. Henry L. Smith, of Maine.

Second class.

1. Paul O. Hebert, of Louisiana.
2. Wm. P. Jones, of Virginia.
3. John McNutt, of Ohio.
4. Chas. P. Kinsbury, of North Carolina.
5. William Gilham, of Indiana.

Third class.

1. Zealous B. Tower, of Massachusetts.
2. Horatio G. Wright, of Connecticut.
3. Masillon Harrison, of Virginia.
4. Smith Stansbury, of Maryland.
5. Josiah Gorgas, of New York.

Fourth class.

1. Henry L. Eustis, of Massachusetts.
2. John D. Kurtz, of District of Columbia.
3. George W. Rains, of Alabama.

RAIL ROAD TRAVELLING. The editor of the Boston Daily Advertiser holds the following language with reference to the rate of travelling on rail roads in this country and in England:

We believe that experience on the good rail roads in this country has shown, that a rate of twenty miles an hour, exclusive of the time allowed for the regular stops, is easily maintainable, on an extended line; but that a much greater speed than this cannot be advantageously maintained, without considerable additional expense, and greater hazard of occasional derangement of the regular system. This derangement is a more serious inconvenience on a line of rail road consisting of a single track than in England, which is double, like the principal rail roads in England.

We learn from a statement in a late London paper, that a change has lately been made, in the hours and rates of the running of the mail trains, on the London and Birmingham rail road, by which they are made to travel the distance of 116½ miles, in five hours; and—deducting 25 minutes for four stops—4 hours 25 minutes, travelling time. This is equal to 25½ miles an hour including stops. This is a greater degree of speed than is regularly realized within our knowledge on any rail road in this country, though not greater than is frequently attained in single journeys; and this regular rate we presume would be practicable unless with the hazard of frequent failures, only on a double road, where the movements of the train are not confined, by the necessity of meeting at particular points.

It appears from the statement above referred to, that there is a day and night mail, from London to Birmingham and Liverpool. The day mail leaves the Euston Grove station, in London, at half past 9 o'clock in the morning, and arrives at Birmingham in 5 hours.

The night mail leaves Euston Grove at half past 8, P. M., and completes the journey to Birmingham in five hours and a half.

The Wilmington and Raleigh rail road company, have just placed another passenger car upon their road.

And the Petersburg, Richmond and Fredericksburg companies have also been obliged to extend their means of accommodation. Travelling on the inland route has greatly increased, and is increasing.

A new locomotive engine, constructed by M. Arnault, was tried a few days since at St. Gaude, on a rail road formed in curves so abrupt and multiplied, as to amount almost to a zigzag line. The means of traversing a succession of sinuosities, has long been a problem with the constructors of rail roads. The experiment in question was made on a large scale with several wagons and upwards of 30 passengers.

RAIL ROADS. The British consul in New York has published a card stating that a committee of the British parliament has been appointed to report on railways, and in order to render such report valuable, it is intended not only to embrace all the rail roads in Great Britain and Ireland, but also the rail-ways in the United States of North America, in operation or in progress of construction; and that, with a view to acquiring such information, a number of queries have been transmitted by the British secretary of state to the consuls in the United States. These queries ask for the length, the dimensions, cost, &c. of each road, the kind of power used, the cost per ton, the number of passengers and amount of freight conveyed, the rates of charge, expense of moving power, and in fact, every particular connected with the construction and operation of rail roads. IMPROVEMENT OF THE OHIO RIVER. From the Pittsburg Gazette of July 1. This noble stream, which is the main artery of the trade of at least ten states of this union, was fated last year to sink very much in the public estimation of its value. The extraordinary drought, which parched vegetation and dried up the streams in every section of the union, did not spare this beautiful river. The consequence was, that the plying of our noble steamers was arrested, and immense trade of the country along the Ohio, and that supplied by it, was laboriously and inadequately carried on by keel boats, &c. The difficulties and disappointments thus produced, excited general attention to the matter, and the noble Ohio was stripped of all the honors which twenty years of faithful service had earned, and the project of a canal along its banks, even to Cincinnati, was seriously discussed in some quarters.

Another year has come round; it is now the first of July, 1839, and it will be seen the river is now in very fine condition, and since Saturday steamboats have arrived from New Orleans, the Arkansas river, St. Louis, Franklin, on the Alleghany river, and Brownsville on the Monongahela.

This morning various boats are delivering their cargoes, accumulated at various points in the great valley, while others are taking in what freight can be collected, to be delivered at various points above and below us.

The Ohio has now been navigable, without interruption, for almost five months, and during that time from six to nine hundred steamboats, with their various cargoes, have arrived here from the most distant ports—from the Falls of St. Anthony on the north, New Orleans on the south, from Peoria on the Illinois, Delphi at the head of the Wabash, and various other widely separated rivers and towns. As many, or probably more, have departed, freighted with the products of our own and foreign countries, to supply the wants of the rapidly increasing millions of our fellow citizens between our city, the Rocky Mountains on the west, the British possessions on the north, and the Gulf of Mexico on the south.

This much has the Ohio already done for us this season, and it is uncertain how much longer may continue to serve us; but what has been done may well be set off against the future, the unprecedented failure of last year, and should regain to our noble river that high ground in public estimation which, prior to last summer, it enjoyed.

Two seasons together, one of drought, the other of a good stage of water, are calculated to attract public attention to the value of this great channel of trade, and to the importance of some improvement of it; not certainly by spending millions in making a canal or rail road along its banks, but by such alterations as can be effected by the expenditure of a few hundred thousand dollars.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICAN POSSESSIONS. The Canada papers mention that the British government is making active preparations for the erection of strong fortifications at various points in its North American provinces. For instance, Bermuda is to be strongly fortified, permanent barracks are to be built at Laprairie with stone towers to defend them, Martello towers are to be erected at Montreal. Fort Wellington at Prescott is to be completed. Fighting Island is to be fortified, and government has purchased several pieces of land in various parts of the province of Kingston, with a view of commencing public works for its defence, on a very large scale. It has been erroneously supposed that these measures have connection with anticipated difficulties with the United States, but the true explanation of them, in our opinion, is to be found in the fact, that they are deemed indispensable to the preservation of the power of the mother country against the outbreaks of her own discontented subjects in the provinces. The presence of a strong military force, distributed at suitable fortified points, may enable the British government to maintain its rule over the Canadas for many years to come, but without such precautions these provinces would, at a much earlier day break up the existing relations. THE JUDGE, THE SAILORS, AND THE LANDSHARKS. On Saturday, judge Story delivered an opinion in the circuit court, in a case involving claims for salvage. The reporter of the Boston Advertiser, alluding to the fact that some of the claims had been bought of the sailors on speculation, remarks:

Judge Story directed the clerk to take no notice whatever of any assignments, but to pay over the money, in all cases, to the persons to whom it was awarded, or those to whom they or their counsel requested it to be paid. His honor remarked that seamen, of all men, were the most imposed upon, and their landlords and others would often contrive to cheat them, not only out of their money, but also, more easily, of any claims they might have for future remuneration. He did not know but the people, who had obtained assignments in this case were honest enough, but his experience in like cases, and his knowledge of the character of seamen, made him distrust every thing of the kind, and induced him to make the rule inflexible, that money must be paid to the claimants themselves, or to responsible members of the bar for them, or to the persons they directed at the time the money was decreed. It was whispered in the bar that many of these claims had been bought up for a mere song, and the clerk said he had received notice of three assignments that morning, one of them without any date.

DESECRATION OF THE MONUMENT OF MR JEFFERSON. We were very much surprised to see during a late visit to the grave of Mr. Jefferson, that the granite monument has been much mutilated and broken by visitors; and that the marble slab over the grave of his wife has also been broken. We trust the good people of the United States, who travel here for the purpose of seeing the place where the body of this immortal man is laid, will desist from thus desecrating this monument. We consider it worse than sacrilege to be breaking in pieces a monument erected over the ashes of one of the most illustrious statesmen and patriots. We never should dare exhibit as a relic, even the smallest particle of stone which we had been guilty of breaking from the monument of the sage of Monticello. More than 1,000 strangers annually visit the grave of Mr. Jefferson. We hope for the future, that all visitors will desist from like depredations.

The editors in the United States can put a stop to this evil, by cautioning the people against it, and we hope they will do so. [Charlottesville Rep.

BATES COOKE. A new work has just been published by J. De Veaux, esq., of Niagara falls, to aid the tourist in his examination of the falls, whirlpool, &c. &c. which among other interesting matter, contains the following characteristic anecdote on our present state comptroller. The Argus calls Mr. Cooke a "federalist." Let those who read the subjoined anecdote tell us of what Mr. Cooke's "federalism" consists.

AN ESCAPE FROM INDIANS.
"Though few the numbers—theirs the strife,
That neither spares nor seeks for life."

Another incident, which occurred on the memorable invasion before alluded to, took place on the Ridge road, a few miles east of Mr. Molyneux's public house. The roads had been deeply broken up, and were frozen in that state, and it was impossible to proceed with wagons; a very little snow enabled the inhabitants slowly to move along with sleighs. They were fleeing from a relentless and cruel enemy. The rear of the fugitives was brought up by a two horse sleigh, driven by a young man, who was walking by the side of his horse. In the sleigh lay his brother, who, one week before had had his leg amputated just below the thigh. His condition was very feeble, and to proceed rapidly, rough as the roads then were, would have been death to him. There was no alternative, but to continue the moderate pace at which they were moving. The driver was armed with a rifle. At that, and distrustfully behind him, he alternately looked; for he knew the foe was near at hand. At length, the war whoop, with its accompanying yells, broke upon their ears. The disabled brother besought the other to leave him to his fate, and by flight to save his own life.

"No," he replied, "if we are to die we will perish together." The party of Indians that pursued them were in full sight; and one, far in advance of the others, called to them to stop, making threatening gestures, and raising his rifle. With the same slow pace the horses proceeded; the driver coolly collecting himself for the conflict, in which there were such fearful odds against him. The Indian bearing forward, and was within a few paces of the sleigh, when the young man suddenly turning himself, quickly raised his rifle, and firing, fatally wounded his pursuer. The savage plunged forward, fell, and his body rolled out of the road. A yell of vengeance from the band in the road, came like a knell of death upon the brothers. At that moment a friendly party of the Tuscaroras were seen descending the adjacent mountain; and the well directed fire they opened upon the British Indians, obliged them precipitately to retire. The driver of the sleigh was the hon. Bates Cooke, and the invalid was his brother Lathrop Cooke, esq. Mr. B. Cooke, at the battle of Queenston, was pilot of the boat, that led the van on that occasion; the boat was brought to the exact point, resting on the men, though fired upon by the sentinel who gave the alarm, were landed without loss.

MILITARY FORCE OF PARIS. The effective force of the garrison of Paris, according to the National, is shortly to be increased by a regiment of cavalry. This reinforcement is urgent. Its necessity has been shown, we are told, not by the official administration of the war department, which is forbidden to interfere in any but matters connected with accounts and correspondence, but by the grand military council sitting at the chateau. All the barracks of the capital, adds the National, are crammed with soldiers from top to bottom; the old one, as well as those constructed since 1850, and the extensive fabrics lately purchased for the same purpose, are already inadequate for the accommodations of the garrison. It would be in consequence difficult to provide lodgings for this reinforcement of cavalry. But the Pavilion Marcan cavalierly solves difficulties of this kind and decided that Paris should be blessed with a new barracks. "At this rate," continues the National, "Paris will shortly absorb the whole army of the interior. Every year the effective force of the troops charged with its safe keeping, augments in an incredible proportion. There are at present within its walls 23 battalions of infantry, three entire regiments of cavalry, four batteries of artillery, two companies of veterans, and the horse and foot municipal guards, that is to say, at least 17,000 bayonets, 2,000 cavalry, and 24 pieces of artillery. Round Paris we find a similar accumulation of military force. There are eight batteries of artillery at Vincennes; two regiments of cavalry at Versailles, one at Rambouillet, one at St. Germain, one at Compiègne, one at Melun, one at Fontainebleau, one at Meaux, &c. and regiments of infantry at Versailles, Ruel, Courbevoie, St. Denis, Vincennes, &c. This is nearly incredible; in less than twelve hours 500,000 men can be assembled on the Boulevards and quays, and in twenty-four hours upwards of 1,000,000. And this army, more numerous than the one with which Napoleon twice conquered Italy, is not deemed sufficient but must still be increased.

VEHICLES. An English paper, in order to show the immense traffic in the streets of London, says:

On Wednesday, the 16th of January, from six in the morning until 12 at night, passed by the Pantheon, 317 gentlemen's two wheel carriages, 935 four wheel, 890 omnibusses, 521 two wheel and 752 four wheel hackney coaches, 91 stage coaches, 372 wagons and drays, 1,407 light carts and sundries, total 5,515. By Stafford place, on Friday, the 18th January, the total is 4,753, out of which 1,213 were omnibusses. On Tuesday, the 22nd of the same month, by Newman street, the total was 6,992; and on Saturday, by Stalford place, the total is stated to be 5,943. On the 26th of January, by Stafford place, between the hours of twelve at night and six in the morning, gentlemen's two wheel carriages 6, four wheel ditto, 4, one omnibus, hackney carriages, two wheel ditto, 3, four wheel 139, stage coaches 2, wagons and drays 28, light carts and sundries 58, total 224. The greatest number of gentlemen's four wheel carriages, and hackney four wheel ditto, appear to have passed on Tuesday, the number of the former on that day being 1,211, and of the latter 1,288.

A gentleman who happened to be in New York a few days since, states that having an idle half hour on his hands, he about four o'clock in the afternoon, commenced counting the vehicles that passed a certain house in the Bowery. The result in thirty-nine minutes, was as follows:

Carriages,	38
Omnibusses,	67
Wagons,	33
Drays,	82
Aggregate,	220

This, he it remembered, was at a late and comparatively dull hour in the afternoon, and in the course of thirty minutes. Any one who will make the calculation, will find that in a matter of this kind, the commercial emporium on this side of the water, may fairly compete, every thing considered, with the great metropolis on the other. FOREIGN NEWS.

By the arrival of the steam-ship Great Western, the New York editors have received Bristol papers of July 6th, the date of the sailing, with London papers of the day previous. The Great Western brings out 110 passengers. The British Queen was to leave England for this country on the 10th of July.

The news brought by the Great Western is of considerable importance. War, it will be seen, has broken out in the east. The pacha of Egypt has been solemnly deposed by the sultan. The commercial intelligence is gloomy. There existed an uncommon scarcity of money in England, and our great staple had suffered a decline in her market.

A London paper of July 1st, has this paragraph: "Among the passengers who have reached this country, by the Great Western, is a gentleman delegated on a special mission by the post office department at Washington, to the authorities of our general post office. The object in view is one which will produce the greatest advantages in facilitating the commerce between Great Britain and the United States. If we are correctly informed, the special messenger from Washington is to make full inquiries into the plans of Mr. Rowland Hill, for the establishment of a uniform penny postage, with the view of extending the system to the United States, at the earliest possible convenience.—Should the government of the United States adopt Mr. Hill's plan, letters will pass throughout the whole continent of the United States at the same rate as it is intended they shall shortly do in this country.

The boundary question.—Appointment of a commission.—Mr. Featherstonhaugh.—The London Morning Herald of June 29th, contains a report that the British government had appointed "two commissioners with instructions to proceed immediately to the disputed territory, for the purpose of surveying it." The same paper adds:

"Of these commissioners, one is stated to be a gallant officer of engineers: the other is alleged to be a Mr. Featherstonhaugh, a gentleman whose connection with the government of the United States, has, recently, been of a somewhat intimate kind. Mr. Featherstonhaugh has resided for some time in America. He enjoys the title of "geologist to the United States;" and he was, a very short while ago, a salaried servant of the federal government.

We would not be understood to disparage the professional eminence of Mr. Featherstonhaugh—nor to question his integrity. But we do entertain very strong doubts as to the prudence of such an appointment. The British government might, surely, find men, in every way qualified to conduct the required survey, without the necessity of employing a gentleman who has just left the service of the other party to the dispute."

At a drawing room held by the Queen, at St. James's palace, on the 20th June, Mrs. Webster, major and Mrs. Van Buren, Mrs. Chase, of Louisiana, Mrs. Paige, Mrs. Frederick Broun, Miss Murray, Miss Low and Mrs. Samuel Jandon, were presented to her majesty by Mrs. Stevenson, the lady of the American minister.

The following were among the company at her majesty's state ball—the American minister and Mrs. Stevenson, Mr. Webster, of the senate of the United States, Mrs. and Miss Webster, major and Mrs. Van Buren, Mrs. Paige, Mr. Vanderpool, of the house of representatives of the United States, Mrs. Vanderpool, major Chase, United States engineer, Mrs. Chase, Mr. Benjamin Rush, secretary, and Mr. M. R. Singleton, attache to the legation of the United States.

On the 19th, the Jamaica bill was passed in the house of commons, by a majority of 10—vote, 267 for, 257 against. It was however lost in the house of lords, a majority of 69 appearing against it.

The Canada bill shared the same fate.

On Friday, June 28th, lord John Russell, on the subject of the Canada bills, said that it was not the intention of the government to proceed with them, except on the maturest consideration, and after affording the amplest opportunity for inquiry. It was therefore intended to send the bill for the union of the Canadas, after its second reading, to those provinces, that it might be fully known and discussed.

The government education bill was passed in the commons on the 20th, by a majority of only five.

Mr. Grote's motion for the ballot was brought forward on the 18th. Mr. Macaulay spoke in favor of it—sir Robert Peel and lord John Russell, against it. The motion was lost by a majority of 117—the vote being, for the motion, 216; against it, 333.

The great chartist petition was presented, in the house of commons on the 4th, by Mr. Atwood. It was literally rolled into the house, being a cylinder of parchment about the diameter of a coach wheel.

Sir Lionel Smith has been transferred from the government of Jamaica, to that of Manritas. Sir Charles Metcalf succeeds him at Jamaica.

We understand that the London Morning Chronicle, and the American merchants, residing in London, are about to give a splendid dinner to Mr. Webster, the eminent American statesman, now on a visit to this country.

His excellency, the American minister, entertained his royal highness, the duke of Sussex, and a distinguished party, at dinner, at Portland-square on Friday evening.

The Canadian prisoners.—John G. Parker and seven other Canadian prisoners are to be released—lord John Russell sent to them, demanding whether they would enter into security, not to enter the province of Upper Canada, or to approach near its borders, provided the government should release them. The prisoners returned an answer. They say, that having no desire to enter Upper Canada, they are willing to enter into the required bonds; and asked to be permitted to enter the province at any future period, provided either of them can obtain the permission of the colonial government to do so.

The plan for the erection of the new Protestant college at Bath, to be called the Queen's college, has now been decided on. It is a very beautiful specimen of the Elizabethan style of architecture, with an elegant square tower in the centre. Lord Powerscourt has given another donation of £50 towards the erection. [Bath Gazette.]

Riot at Birmingham, Thursday, July 4th.—This evening the bull ring meetings of the chartists have been brought to a crisis. At eight o'clock this night, the usual hour of meeting, there was a large assemblage of the people, accompanied by banners, &c. To the great surprise, however, of the mob, about a quarter past eight, a party of the London police arrived, and immediately proceeded to arrest the leaders and disperse the meeting. The metropolitan police were sent down by the home office, and arrived only a few minutes before they attempted the dispersion of the chartist multitude. It is impossible, in a few lines, to describe the confusion which ensued after the attacks of the police. The mob resisted, and although the London police were well organized, and most determined in their efforts, the number of the chartists to whom they were opposed, and their evident preparation to meet any attack, led to the temporary defeat of the police. For about ten minutes the fight was fearful, and I am sorry to add, it is feared that in more than one instance, the consequence will prove fatal. The police were driven back into Moor street, and, for a short time, it was apprehended that the mob would succeed in an assault upon the prison. Fortunately, the 4th royal Irish dragoons, headed by colonel Chatterton, and accompanied by Mr. Scholefield, the mayor, arrived in time to afford protection to the civil authorities; and, as I am informed by a bystander, a gentleman of influence in the town saved the public office from popular fury.

The 4th Irish dragoons, together with the rifle brigade, immediately encompassed the bull ring, and stopped every avenue leading to it. The mob, upon their appearance, took to flight in all directions, and, at the time I write, the town is in a state of great excitement.

Several of the London police are seriously injured, and it is feared that one inspector is fatally wounded, by a stab in the side. A magistrate, in expectation of his death, is now taking his deposition. Five of the police have been conveyed to the public office, some of whom are unquestionably seriously injured. [Times.]

Fifty men and boys were killed by an explosion in a coal mine at south Shields, June 28th.

American flour was quoted at Liverpool on the 2d of July—sweet 34s. 6d. a 36s. 6d.—sour 22s. 6d. a 34s.

We notice the death, in Paris, of lord Wm. Bencefield; and at Madrid, by suicide, of M. Maria Delgado, director of the astronomical observatory in that capital.

The Dutch troops have quietly taken possession of the territory which Belgium has been forced to cede. On the 21st June, they entered Venloo, without any demonstration on the part of the inhabitants.

It is announced in the London Sun of the evening of the 5th July, that the lady Flora Hastings died at 2 o'clock on that morning, a victim (we presume from what we see in the papers) to outraged sensibilities.

The Thames tunnel is expected to be opened for foot passengers in about fifteen months.

On the 20th of June, considerable excitement was occasioned in the money market, by the publication of a notice of the bank of England, to the effect that thereafter the rate of interest on bills of exchange and bills discounted, would be established at 5½ per cent. and that in accordance with a resolution of the directors, all advances by the bank would be made at 5½ per cent. and that only upon the same terms.

London money market, July 4. This being the weekly meeting of the bank directors, the speculators and moneyed interests are anxiously waiting to learn the result of their deliberations with respect to advancing the discount to 6 per cent. Some persons are of opinion that they will wait a post day or two, to give time for their late operation of five and a half per cent. act on the foreign exchanges. Consols are not quite so good as they closed, and may be quoted at 93½ for the account; exchequer bills 25 27; India bonds 28 30; bank stock 191 192; India stock 255 257. In the foreign market most of the prices are nominal, as they closed; Spanish active 19½; Portuguese 34½; three per cents 20½ 21; Brazilian 77; B-gian 102½; Colombian 32½ 33½; Mexican 26½; Dutch two and a half per cents 51½ 5½; five per cents 102½.

Evening. The news from the east caused some additional depression of stocks to-day. The apprehension that the bank directors would advance the rate of discount subsided, as it was learned before the close of business that the charge of 5½ per cent. would not be disturbed for the present, and subsequently to this there was a trifling reaction. Consols left off at 92½ to ¼ for the opening. Exchequer bills 25s. to 27s. premium, and bank stock at 191 2.

Liverpool cotton market, July 1.—The cotton market is exceedingly heavy. The prices have declined from 3d. to 1d. per lb. The sales for this week have been 3,550 bales Mobile, Alabama and Tennessee at 7d. to 9d., and 3,550 New Orleans at 7½ to 10½. Throughout the week the market was quite dull, closing heavily at a reduction of ¼ on American.

Liverpool market, July 3. Prices ¼ lower than the quotations of the 25th ult. July 4th. 1,200 bales at yesterday's prices—demand still limited.

FRANCE. The southern provinces of France have been visited with violent storms of hail.

The Journal de St. Sever, in the Landes, states that a storm, of the same nature, was so destructive in that department, that the damage in a single arrondissement is estimated at 3,000,000 francs. In the environs of St. Sever, the hail fell in such quantities, and of such size, that sixty-seven quails and forty-two partridges were battered to pieces, and the whole of the poultry not under cover during the storm were killed. Several persons were severely wounded by the hail. The roofs and windows of the houses of St. Sever were nearly all broken.

SPAIN. London, July 5. We have received the Madrid journals to the 26th June. The army of the centre was under the command of a colonel; the two generals (Ayerbe and Noguera) being ill at Saragossa.

It is said that general Sanze is to take the command in Aragon, and that he will be replaced in Galicia by Francisco Narvaez.

We have Bayonne letters of the 29th June. Don Carlos was still at Durango. Espartero had made no further movement. The Maritzino troops occupied Amurrio, Menagritia, Calpedazca, and Arceiz; Marotto occupied Llodio, Laguarda, Aquerduca, Areata and Arozio. This differs from previous reports, which stated that Marotto having abandoned Llodio, it had been taken possession of by the Christians. It is said that desertion makes great progress in Espartero's army.

The garrison of Pampeluna has reinforced Diego Leon at Lozaria. He proposes to attack the fort San Victorio.

The visit of the Duke de Nemours to Seville has given rise to an absurd tissue of reports in some of the Madrid papers of the 25th ultimo; according to which, France is to intervene with an army commanded by the duke, as well as by a fleet on the coast. His royal highness is to marry the young queen, the eldest son of Don Carlos is to marry a German princess, with whom a project of the kind already exists, and Don Carlos himself is to retire to Rome.

GREEK AND EGYPT. War in the east. The London papers of July 4th, announce, on the authority of letters from Constantinople of June 12th, that the sultan has not only declared war against Mehemet Ali, the pacha of Egypt, but as supreme caliph of the faithful and representative of the prophet has issued sentence of excommunication against him and his son Ibrahim, deposing them from the government of Egypt and Syria.

This sentence was pronounced on the 9th, the retah, or bull of malediction, being prepared by the grand mufti, after a grave consultation of the most learned doctors of the mussulman law. The 14th being Friday, the Mahomedan Sabbath, the sentence of excommunication was to be read in all the mosques.

The Turkish fleet left the Golden Horn in two divisions. The first sailed on the 8th, and the second on the 9th ultimo. They were to rendezvous at Gallipoli, with some 1,000 mariners were waiting on the board, with large quantities of military and other supplies. The fleet consist of thirty-four sail of all sizes, well equipt and the crews were in high spirits. Previous to the sailing of the second division, the sultan, though in extremely bad health, went on board the Mahomdi, the admiral's ship, to say a few words of encouragement to the officers and men, and to give them the benediction of the prophet.

The reception of his highness was most enthusiastic. Among the Englishmen on board, were captains Walker, Conolly and Lee, the first of whom the sultan raised to the rank of rear admiral. General Jochans, a French officer, who served with distinction in Greece and Spain, was likewise on board, but known to be in the confidence of the sultan, and one of the mainsprings of the expedition, he has declined any recognized rank, choosing to appear as the friend of the captain pacha. The sultan having taken leave of the officers, withdrew amid the roar of artillery. The destination of the fleet was Alexandria, which it was reported in Constantinople, Mehemet Ali had left in a defenceless condition.

The sultan's final resolution being communicated to the European ambassadors, an imperial firman was prepared, which was despatched on the 13th ult. by the Stamboul steamer, to Hafiz pacha, in which that general is invited with the pachas of Syria and Egypt.

German papers contain letters from Constantinople of the same date, of which the following summary is given.

They announce that the Egyptian army in Arabia, under Kirschid pacha, has entered Bassorah; that lord Ponsonby declared that the time for tergiversation was past, and that for acting was come at last; and that Admiral Roussin was in the greatest distress, France having assumed something like the protectorship of Mehemet Ali. On the 24th ult. news reached Vienna from Alexandria to the effect that war had commenced in good earnest in Syria, and that the troops of Ibrahim pacha fell back from all their positions, fighting as they retreated, so that the Turkish army was encamped in the territory of Mehemet Ali. They likewise state that 5,000 Egyptians deserted to Hafiz pacha at the first onset.

It appears that Ibrahim was not himself present at this engagement, being at the time at Aleppo; for the instant the news reached him he commanded the division stationed there to advance and meet the enemy in the field. To have allowed Hafiz to approach Aleppo undisturbed would have been to permit him to be joined by the divisions commanded by the pachas of Bagdad and Mossul—an error which Ibrahim is too good a general to commit. England and France must now declare themselves; and if they would prevent Europe from being involved in the blaze of this war, they must unanimously act with good faith. No time is to be lost.

London, July 5. In the French chamber of deputies on Wednesday, the debate on the situation of affairs in the east was continued. The debate was opened by a speech from M. Joutroy, the reporter of the committee, arguing in favour of preserving the independence and stability of the Ottoman empire. The grant was voted by a very large majority, there being 257 for, and only 26 against.

Declaration of war by the sultan against Mehemet Ali and Ibrahim pacha.

Paris, Wednesday morning, July 3. The French government has received the following telegraphic despatches, which are of vast importance. I transmit also an important letter from Alexandria, which I have just received from my private correspondent.

Telegraphic despatches from Marseilles, dated July 2. "The English packet Homer, coming from Malta, announces that on the 14th June, news had been received from Constantinople of a first engagement, in consequence of which the Turks had gained possession of several villages of the beylic of Aintab, (read Aintab). This advantage has caused the war party to prevail, and it has been decided in council that Hafiz pacha should give orders to advance. The first division of the Turkish fleet was seen on the 15th in the Dardanelles." "The French consul at Alexandria to the president of the council.

"Marseilles, July 2." "Mehemet Ali has given orders to Ibrahim pacha to stop, wherever he might be, on the arrival of captain Callier, and to wait for the issue of arrangements made by the great powers. The Egyptian squadron has gone out of port, but without hostile intentions. It has gone to cruise on the coast of Syria. (Signed), A. FOX. "The administrator of telegraphic lines."

This last despatch, though it came from Marseilles yesterday by telegraph, is without date from Alexandria. This diminishes slightly from its value. Captain Callier, who is mentioned therein, is a French officer of the staff of great reputation. He was sent by the emperor, and is employed on a diplomatic mission. It was also one of the learned paravans named by the prince de Polignac, and at the head of which was M. Nuehad. This officer followed the operations of the army of Ibrahim pacha during the campaign of 1833, and he then saw how little attention Mehemet Ali paid to the remonstrances of the French government. In 1833, from St. Jean d'Acre to Kutaya, Ibrahim received three times orders to stop, to listen to the French and English negotiators; and then three times immediately afterwards he was ordered to press on hostilities. The French government has not made known what were the instructions it has given to captain Callier; but though he is a brave officer, it is not at all probable that he will succeed in preventing Ibrahim pacha from engaging in war with Hafiz pacha.

A letter from Vienna, by express, says: "News have been received from Constantinople to the 12th instant. The Turkish fleet sailed—the last on the 12th; and proceeded to the Dardanelles. A courier has since left to announce to Hafiz pacha, the speedy arrival of the fleet, and to take to him a firman naming in success to Mehemet. He is ordered to attack Ibrahim as soon as the fleet shall arrive off the coast of Syria."

A letter from Constantinople of the 12th, announces that Kirschid pacha, the chief of the Egyptian Arabian corps, has entered Bassorah.

Latest news from Alexandria. The following private letter from Alexandria is the last intelligence which has reached Paris, except the telegraphic despatch, the date of which is not known: "Alexandria, June 10.

"War is inevitable. The first news the pacha has received is not favorable to his flag, but he is not discouraged. Ibrahim writes in good spirits. He was aware that the Turkish army had received orders to attack him, and he is preparing to give them a warm reception. He was getting ready for a great battle which could not be avoided. Great efforts are made here by the English and French consuls to keep Mehemet Ali from commencing the attack; but Mehemet Ali has rejected all the counsels, as he finds that whilst he is negotiating with the consuls, the Turkish troops are advancing in Syria. Mehemet appears to listen to all that is said to him; and no doubt the French government believes as it did in 1833, that it will stop the progress of Ibrahim pacha in Syria. This will not be the case. The public despatch says one thing, the private despatch says the other. Mehemet and Ibrahim will sacrifice their last soldier before they will abandon their pachalies in Syria, and all the powers of Europe cannot make him give up on this point. He will pay the tribute, and will acknowledge the porte as suzerain, but this is the extent of his concessions. You must not be deceived in Europe by the pacific appearances of Mehemet, or by what you hear of his being willing to listen to the advice of the great powers. The fleet sails to Syria, and takes out men, money and ammunition. You may have an engagement with the Turks. You may rely on my conveying assurance that the pacha will not make any concessions of territory in Syria to the porte, except what shall be taken at the point of the sword."

From our London correspondent.

North and South American Coffee House, London, Thursday, July 4, four o'clock, P. M. The rumors of war in the east have at length assumed a more definite shape. Letters from Constantinople of the 11th inst. state that on the 9th war had been formally proclaimed in the Turkish capital against the rebellious pacha of Egypt; and the writers even go so far as to report the speech made by the sultan to the crews of his fleet on the occasion. The questions now asked are, what part will France take? what part will Russia take? what part will England take? will there be a general war in Europe? To the three first questions, lord Palmerston would probably decline to give any answer. To the last would say "no;" and that is the common sense view of the case. But it must not be disguised that there is a devilish spirit abroad in favor of war and bloodshed, to restrain which will require great wisdom and great firmness on the part of the leading governments. The French ministers have demanded an extraordinary credit from the chamber of deputies, for the purpose of augmenting their fleet in the Mediterranean.

Notes exchanged by the French and Russian cabinets.

Note of the French charge d'affaires at St. Petersburg. The undersigned charge d'affaires of his majesty the king of the French, is instructed to express to the cabinet of St. Petersburg the profound affliction which the French government has experienced on learning the conclusion of the treaty of the 8th of July last, between his majesty the emperor of Russia and the grand signor. In the opinion of the king's government, that treaty imparts to the mutual relations of the Ottoman empire and of Russia a new character, against which the powers of Europe have a right to pronounce themselves.

The undersigned is therefore, instructed to declare, that if the stipulations of that act were hereafter to bring on an armed intervention of Russia in the internal affairs of Turkey, the French government would hold itself wholly at liberty to adopt such line of conduct as circumstances might suggest, acting from that moment as if the said treaty existed not. The undersigned is also desirous to inform the imperial cabinet that a similar declaration has been delivered to the Ottoman porte by his majesty's ambassador at Constantinople.

I. DE LAGRÈNE.

Reply of the Russian minister of foreign affairs.

The undersigned has received the note by which M. I. de Lagrene, charge d'affaires of his majesty the king of the French, has communicated the deep regret which the conclusion of the treaty of the 8th of July between Russia and the porte has caused the French government, without stating at the same time either the motives of that regret, or the nature of the objections to which that treaty may give rise. The undersigned cannot be acquainted with them—still less can he understand them. The treaty of the 8th of July is purely defensive; it has been concluded between two independent powers, exercising the plenitude of their rights, and it does no prejudice to the interests of any state whatever.

What could, therefore, be the objections which other powers might deem themselves justified in raising against such a transaction? How, above all, could they declare that they consider it of no validity, unless they have in view the subversion of an empire which the treaty is destined to preserve? But such cannot be the design of the French government. It would be at open variance with all the declarations it made in the last complications in the east. The undersigned must, therefore, suppose that the opinion expressed in M. de Lagrene's note rests upon incorrect data, and that, better informed by the communication of the treaty which the porte has recently made known to the French ambassador at Constantinople, his government will better appreciate the value and usefulness of a transaction concluded in a spirit as pacific as conservative.

That act changes, indeed, the nature of the relations between Russia and the porte; for, to a long enmity, it makes relations of intimacy and confidence succeed, wherein the Turkish government will henceforth find a guarantee of stability, and, if need be, means of defence calculated to insure its preservation.

It is in this conviction, and guided by the purest and most disinterested intentions, that his majesty the emperor is resolved on faithfully fulfilling, should the occasion present itself, the obligations which the treaty of the 8th of July imposes upon him, acting thus as if the declaration in M. de Lagrene's note did not exist. N. F. ESSELRODE.

JOHN RIDGE, THE CHEROKEE INDIAN.

From the Journal of Commerce.

The newspapers announce the assassination of John Ridge, and his father, major Ridge. Both these individuals were extensively known. Ridge senior, called in his own nation and elsewhere, major Ridge, was a distinguished chief in the Cherokee nation, has frequently visited Washington, and was a man of uncommon ability and influence. His son John, was educated at the Cornwall school, Connecticut, where he married a respectable white lady. She accompanied him back to his tribe, and is now, with her children, west of the Mississippi, at the late residence of her husband, Honey creek, near the corner of Arkansas and Missouri. John Ridge was about thirty-eight years of age; was formerly a practising attorney among the Cherokees, and at one time president of the senate of that nation. In the year 1832, John Ridge and Elias Boudinot, both Cherokees, visited this city, Boston, &c. and addressed several meetings in behalf of their nation. Those who heard Mr. Ridge will remember his gentlemanly bearing and stirring eloquence. At a subsequent period, the Messrs. Ridge, father and son, were induced to cease their opposition to the removal of the Cherokees west of the Mississippi, and to become the warm advocate of that measure. Mr. Ross, and the party among the nation who opposed the removal, accused Major Ridge and his son of having been bribed to forsake what they considered the true interests of their people.

Since the emigration of the Cherokees to the west of the "father of waters," John Ridge has been engaged in trade, and has visited this city two or three times, where he has purchased goods largely. His last visit was in May, when he paid for the principal part of his purchases in post notes of the United States. He was accompanied by two young gentlemen of the Cherokee nation, who were also engaged in trade. He was a man of distinct wealth and power, pleased with rich apparel and ornaments, jealous of his supposed rights, enterprising, and seemed to be an affectionate husband and father.

During his visit here in 1832, Mr. Ridge was invited to attend a mouthly concert, and to make an address. He would be happy, he said, to attend the meeting, but he wished to be excused from speaking, as it seemed to him inconsistent in one who did not profess religion, to address a religious meeting. He was, however, urged to make some remarks, and complied. He began by saying that he stood before them, he was ashamed to say, as one who had not embraced Christianity himself, and yet he could relate many facts showing the beneficial influence of religion upon those who had been converted in his nation. He related several striking facts. Among them was one respecting an eminent Cherokee who had been reclaimed from deep degradation by the power of the gospel. He had sunk so low, by his intemperate habits, that he was generally called "Wicked Richard," but by the grace of God, he had been restored to his right mind, was a judge of the supreme court, and during vacations often went about addressing his countrymen powerfully on the subject of religion.

Mr. Ridge spoke with exultation of his intention of having his two sons educated at a New England college, and appeared to be engrossed with literary pursuits, and a desire to promote the intellectual and moral good of his nation.

We are truly sorry to find a confirmation of the murder of John Ridge, a Cherokee chief, personally known to us, and to many into whose hands his sheet will fall. He was a gentleman of polished manners and sterling sense; a fine speaker and an amiable, excellent man. He early perceived a necessity of a removal to the west, and assented to the treaty which afterwards gave rise to so much discussion and censure, both in and out of congress, as having been made with only a small part of the nation, and which was subsequently modified so as to suit the views of John Ross, the principal chief. Between Ross and Ridge there has not been a friendly feeling since the date of the treaty, but we trust it will turn out that Ross is not the murderer—At least we hope so. [Journal of Commerce.

Outrage among the Cherokee Indians near Fort Gibson. Murder of John Ridge and his father, &c. By a letter received in this city yesterday, from one of our citizens at Fort Gibson, Arkansas, we are informed that about a week since, the celebrated chief John Ridge, and his father, two of the most prominent persons in the nation, were most brutally and savagely murdered, and that John Ross, the leader of the opposition party, has, in consequence thereof, been compelled to take up his head quarters at Fort Gibson, for personal security.

Note. We knew John Ridge, and concur in the just eulogy of the Journal of Commerce. Ridge was the patriot of his tribe. Ross, a half bred, ambitious and avaricious, was made the instrument of the opposition in congress to frustrate the measures of the administration, and the true interests of the Indians. He kept multitudes of them starving in Georgia, when abundance would have survived among them in the west. Ridge is a sacrifice to the success of his efforts and growing popularity.

[Globe.]
Extract from Little Rock, July 1st. News has arrived here that the Cherokees are quarrelling among themselves; that Ross has waylaid and shot Ridge; as they returned from the great council; that both of their parties are actively preparing for a fight; the general Arbuckle told them they must not fight, and that he would provide them. Ross told the general they would fight in spite of him. There is trouble brewing among the Indians on our frontier, and if they once get a going, our situation here will not be enviable, as we are only about 150 miles from the line, and it is said they can raise, if combined, 20,000 men. I mean if all the tribes join. We have plenty of arms and ammunition here. If the above is confirmed, and any thing worth relating happens, I will write again soon. [Id.]

THE SONS OF MURAT.

The countess of Lipona, ex-queen of Naples, has appointed Joachim Murat, son of Lucien Bonaparte, her residuary legate, and has left to him every thing left to her by the emperor Napoleon—the his sword, bed, portrait, &c. The will directs that he shall be educated and live in France. Her daughter, Letitia, and Luigia (countess of Popoli and Rasponi), will receive what the law accords them, and the two sons will retain every thing that will remind them of their brave and heroic sire. We see it stated that these young men reside in this country—in what part we are not told; and are practising as barristers. Their absence from their mother is said to have greatly increased the anguish of her last moments. [Bos. Trans.

The two sons of Murat referred to in the above paragraph, are Achille and Lucien. Achille, the eldest son, was on board the frigate in which his father sailed on that desperate and fatal expedition to recover the throne of Naples. At that time he was some ten or twelve years old. Subsequently he passed several years in Austria, and on coming of age, emigrated to the United States. He purchased a plantation near St. Augustine, in Florida, and devoted himself to the study of the law, and was admitted to practise as an attorney and counsellor.

About the year 1825, the Seminoles, who at that time occupied what is known as Middle Florida, were induced to cede their lands, and to retire southward into the peninsula. Murat, in company with his friend, col. Gadsden, of South Carolina, was one of the first adventurers who explored the country thus ceded. They built a hut in the midst of the wilderness, and employed themselves in land hunting, that is, in seeking out fertile tracks which might be purchased to advantage. These gentlemen entered plantations some fifteen or twenty miles west of Tallahassee: Murat called his plantation Lipona, the title assumed by his mother, which is formed from Napoli, the Italian of Naples, by reading the syllables backward.

Among the French, and other foreign settlers in that vicinity, Murat commonly went by the title of the prince, though the state which he kept did not exactly correspond with the notions we are apt to attach to that title. He might be met in the woods, on a lean horse, dressed in the common homespun of the country, with a long whip in his hand, hunting cattle, with the outward style of what is known in that country as a Georgia cracker, rather than that of the heir and claimant of the throne of Naples. Having settled in the woods, he availed himself of his liberty, and seemed to cast off all regard for the mere forms and shows of artificial society. His domestic establishment was on the same careless plan. It is related of him, that one day a large party from Tallahassee having come out to pay him a visit, he sent for his cook to inquire what there was in the house for dinner. "Nothing at all," replied the cook—a circumstance rather apt to happen in the days of his bachelor house-keeping, when things went with him pretty much at sixes and sevens. Just at the moment of this alarming announcement, the overseer came in to say that he had driven the cattle of the plantation, and to inquire of Murat what mark he should put upon them. It is to be observed, by the way, that in Florida, the cattle belonging to the several settlers run wild in the woods, the whole time.

Once a year, however, they are hunted and driven up, for the purpose of marking the young cattle—every proprietor having a particular mark, generally a slit of some kind in the ear, by which his particular cattle are distinguished. "What mark?" said Murat, "why, cut off their left ears, and bring them all in directly to the cook!" This was done accordingly, and Murat's guests were soon served with a dinner consisting principally of cow's ears, dressed in every variety of style. To this day, in riding through the woods in that vicinity, if a cow happens to be seen mutilated of her left ear, she will be pointed out with the observation, "there goes one of Murat's cattle."

That Murat is a philosopher and no epicure, will appear from the following anecdote. One day at a dinner party, the conversation turning on the different modes of viands, Murat declared that during his early residence in Florida, he had made trial in the way of eating—divesting himself of all prejudices—of all the various birds and beasts which he could lay his hands upon. "Crow soup," said he, "is fine; alligator's tail is excellent; but turkey buzzard is not good; I have no prejudices, but it is not good."

Subsequently Murat married a daughter of Mr. Willis, the navy agent at Pensacola, and a grand niece of general Washington. Mr. Willis had emigrated from Fredericksburg, Virginia, to Florida, bringing his daughter, a beautiful young widow, with him, and at that time resided at Tallahassee. Mrs. Murat is a lady of uncommon beauty, spirit and good sense. An excellent housekeeper, she has put Murat's domestic establishment upon a somewhat more orderly footing.

The French revolution of 1830 excited new hopes in the mind of Murat. He mortgaged his property, raised what money he could, and set sail for Europe. He spent some time in England, and John Randolph observed of Mrs. Murat, that she was the only American he had ever met abroad, of whom he was not ashamed. Brought into society esteemed the most aristocratic, exquisite and recherche, she made no attempt to imitate the affectations, and never condescended to re-echo the sentiments of her new associates, but maintained the simple elegance of her native manners, and on all fit occasions expressed opinions and sentiments proper to an American woman, though discomfited enough from the prevailing sentiments of her new associates.

After waiting in vain for a repeal of the law which excludes the family of Napoleon from the French territory, and finding that any ambitious hopes he might have entertained, had little prospect of fulfilment, Murat went to Belgium, and obtained a commission of colonel of cavalry in the army of Leopold. He had originally received a military education. Afterward, however, when Leopold married a daughter of the king of France, he found it necessary to dismiss Murat from his service, who returned to Florida after an absence of three years.

Returning to Florida, Murat resumed the occupation of a planter and lawyer. Previous to his visit to Europe, he had been for several years a postmaster, under the appointment of the United States government. Subsequent to his return he was appointed judge of the county court of Jefferson, in which office he gave good satisfaction.

Achille Murat has little of the personal appearance of his father. He is of small size, and his constitution has suffered severely from the effects of a neuralgic shock, experienced some years ago, that he appears to be much older than he is. His face presents a striking resemblance to the portraits of Napoleon. He is a man of great accomplishments, being thoroughly versed in the Italian, German, French and English languages, all which he speaks with perfect fluency. He has a great taste for mathematics, and is well acquainted with all the most recent works in that department of science.

He is a man of reflection, but in many points his opinions are rather visionary. He has a strong disposition to engage in speculations, but in these undertakings has been generally unsuccessful. His most sure resource has been an annuity which he has received from his mother. Large sums of money recovered from his father's estate, have from time to time come into his hands, but they have generally been spent soon after they have been received.

Joachim Murat, the younger brother has resided, we believe, principally in the state of New York, where he has acted as agent for Joseph Bonaparte, for the sale of certain lands belonging to him in the northern part of that state. He lives now, we believe, in New Jersey. [Boston Atlas.

WASHINGTON'S DIPLOMA.

From the National Gazette.

Files of old continental journals frequently furnish us with matter of an interesting character, for those who are fond of reading about revolutionary times. This being the season of collegiate commencements, we present a document as not ill-timed, which to many may be a novelty. It is a translation (evidently) of a diploma, given by Harvard university, conferring the degree of LL. D. upon general Washington. It is worthy of remark, that when this compliment was paid to the commander-in-chief of the continental army, he had in that capacity performed no single exploit, except the movements by which the enemy was forced to evacuate Boston. His general abilities and acquirements (lord Brougham to the contrary notwithstanding) were known and acknowledged by the nation and its representatives, who, from a number of military officers, neither experienced nor waiting in thorough education, selected Washington as the most able on all accounts to lead the armies of his country, and consequently to sway her destinies.

This diploma we do not remember to have seen in Marshall's life of Washington, and have looked through Sparks' without finding it. It may be worth while to mention, that when it was conferred, collegiate honors were not so cheap as in our day, when institutions of learning are prone to give parchments, rather for the sake of spreading their own names, than on account of any special merits in the grantees. Harvard university also made general Jackson a doctor of laws, and a British faculty of arts, recently bestowed the same distinction upon the Russian grand duke. How well they deserved the title, is not so apparent to our apprehension as to the erudite gentlemen, who testified with their names to their superior knowledge and talents.

"The corporation of Harvard college, in Cambridge, New England, to all faithful in Christ, to whom these presents shall come, greeting.—Whereas, academical degrees were, originally, instituted for this purpose: that men, eminent for knowledge, wisdom and virtue, who have highly merited of the republic of letters, should be rewarded with the honors of those laurels; there is the greatest propriety in conferring such honors on the very illustrious gentleman, GEORGE WASHINGTON, esquire, the accomplished general of the confederated colonies in America, whose knowledge and patriotic ardor are manifest to all; who, for his distinguished virtue, both civil and military, in the first place, being selected by the suffrages of the Virginians, one of their delegates, exercising himself with fidelity and singular wisdom for the defence of liberty, when in the utmost danger of being forever lost, and for the salvation of his country, and then at the earnest request of that grand council of patriots, without hesitation, left his delightful seat in Virginia, and the affairs of his own estate, that, through all the fatigues and dangers of a camp, without accepting any reward, he might deliver New England from the unjust and cruel arms of Great Britain, and defend the other colonies; and who, by the most signal suites of Divine Providence on his military operations, drove the fleet and troops of the enemy, with disgraceful precipitation, from the town of Boston; which, for eleven months, had been shut, fortified and defended by a garrison of seven thousand regulars, so that the inhabitants, who suffered a great variety of hardships and cruelties, while the omnipotent power of their oppressors was so free in their depredations; the neighboring towns are also freed from the assaults of arms, and our university has the agreeable prospect of being restored to its ancient seat.

Know ye therefore, that we, the president and fellows of Harvard college, in Cambridge, with the consent of the honored and reverend overseers of our academy, have constituted and created the said George Washington, who merits the highest honors—doctor of laws, the law of nature and nations, and the civil law—and have given and granted to him, at the same time, all the rights, privileges and honors, to said degree pertaining.

In testimony whereof, we have affixed the common seal of the university to these letters, and subscribe them with our hand-writing, this 3d day of April, in the year of our Lord, 1776.

MARYLAND.

From the Baltimore Post.

On this day, the 20th of June, two hundred and seven years ago, the original charter of Maryland was granted to Cecilius, lord Baltimore, by Charles I. The grant, however, was obtained by his father, George Calvert, who had been secretary of the privy council of James I, a post which he resigned in 1624, upon his conversion to the Catholic religion. This change of faith, notwithstanding, lost him nothing of public favor, for his high moral worth caused him to be knighted in the succeeding year, at which time he was the representative in parliament of the University of Oxford.—His death, just at the moment of the grant, left the charter in the hands of his son, Cecilius, who, far from possessing the enterprising spirit of his parent, abandoned the settlement of the projected colony to the personal supervision of his brother Leonard, who was constituted his lieutenant general.

The colony, raised under the charter, consisted of about two hundred persons, chiefly, if not entirely, of the Roman Catholic faith, and many of them gentlemen of family and fortune. They embarked from the Isle of Wight on the 22d of November, 1633, and reached Point Comfort on the 24th of February. After a short rest, they sailed up the Potomac, in search of a suitable site for settlement. They took formal possession of an island, called St. Clements, and thence proceeded about forty leagues up the river to Piscataway, an Indian town, from which they returned with the intention of locating nearer the mouth of the river. In retracing their steps they entered the St. Georges, or, as it is now named, the St. Mary's river, sailing up which, some six or seven miles, they came to an Indian town called Yaocoma. This was purchased from the aboriginal possessors, and on the 27th March 1634, the colony disembarked and there laid the foundation of the old city of St. Mary's and the state of Maryland. From this pilgrim colony commences the true history of our state—history marked by many events, at certain eras, as striking in reproach of man's intolerance, as grateful, at others, to the feelings of the philanthropist, and in its later chapters, most cheering to the believer in the humanizing creed of man's capability of self-government, and his full and free enjoyment of those inalienable rights secured to him by "nature and nature's God."

The history of Maryland, of which so much remains to be collected to do it perfect justice, is particularly marked by four or five eventful periods, each of which might be dilated upon, by a capable hand, with much instructive and valuable detail. The illegal possession of Kentland, by Clayborn, prior to the Calvert grant, would open the introduction to such a work, with a chapter full of the romance of enterprise, address and courage. The first proprietary government from 1632 to 1683, would afford details of pilgrim constancy, trials and sufferings, rich with deep interest. The Protestant revolution and the royal government thence ensuing, from 1683 to 1715, would elucidate, among other things, the tyranny of religionism which must ever be the result of that impious union of church and state, which would measure with its Procrustean standard, the consciences of men and their deep responsibilities to their creator. The restoration of the proprietary, from 1715 to 1763, would be gradually marked with that progress of improvement and prosperity, which, with its coincident enlightening of opinion, prepared the colony rightfully to estimate its strength, and eventually to contend for those rights, which, after the treaty of 1763, the crown would have infringed by its compact and other similar measures of oppression. The statistics of this era afford the most pleasing evidence of colonial prosperity. As we have seen, the settlement at St. Mary's was composed of about 200 pilgrims; in 1733 the whole number of taxable inhabitants was 31,470. In 1748 the population had increased to 130,000, or 94,000 whites and 36,000 blacks; in 1756 it was 154,183, or 107,963 whites and 46,223 blacks; and in 1761 it amounted to 164,007, or, 114,232 whites and 49,675 blacks. In this position, as to her population, and with an export of her products in 1861, in the articles of wheat, lumber, corn, flour, iron, skins and furs, amounting to about £50,000 currency, and in tobacco to about 28,000 hogsheads, valued at £140,000, Maryland found herself at the opening of the revolutionary era. A review of this memorable period would be crowded with incidents, as creditable to the valor of her sons in the field as honorable to their civil administration. The Patriotic and colonial government was one of the "old thirteen," she pointed, with pride, to her Smallwoods and Howards, her Carrolls and Chases; and, if from the laying of her corner stone at St. Mary's, to the day when she assumed the glorious position of a free and sovereign state, that justice has not yet been done to her history in all its requisite details, the time, it may be trusted, is not far distant when some grateful son may stand out from among her offspring, able and willing to enter upon the task of patriotism, and burnish up the records of her history, from the dust and corosions of time and neglect. It will be a labor, in which truthfulness, patience, energy and high enthusiasm can only hope to accomplish all that such a history demands. The true incitement must be patriotism; the reward must be the lasting gratitude of future generations.

A SCRAP OF HISTORY.

It may be interesting, if not new to our readers, to be informed in what way the state of Connecticut became possessed of that portion of the state of Ohio, known as the Western Reserve.

The original charter of the state of Connecticut was granted by Charles II, in 1662. That charter defined the limits of the state as follows:

From the south line of Massachusetts on the north, to Long Island Sound on the south, and from the Narragansett river on the east, to the Pacific ocean on the west.

It will be seen by reference to a map, that these boundaries would enclose not only what is now the state of Connecticut, but also portions of the states of New York and New Jersey—nearly one-half of Pennsylvania—all the northern portions of the states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and a goodly part of the territories of Iowa, Missouri and Oregon. There was a clause in the charter, however, which excepted from its operations all the portions above then occupied by prior settlers. This exception excluded such parts of New York and New Jersey as were within the prescribed limits. A dispute arising between New York and Connecticut, as to the boundaries between these states, it was settled by commissioners, appointed by the king in 1664, who decided that Maroonce river should be the western boundary of Connecticut.

For nearly a century thereafter, Connecticut neglected to claim or settle any part of their territory west of New York, and the charter being granted to William Penn in 1681, embracing all that part of the same which lies within the present state of Pennsylvania, a dispute ultimately arose between the two colonies, as to the right of possession in the disputed territory. Both colonies sold the same land, and each guaranteed to the purchasers undisturbed possession. This excited innumerable quarrels, and resort was often had to force of arms to expel the intruders.

In 1770, the legislature of Connecticut transmitted to England certain questions to be presented to the most able lawyers, respecting her title to lands west of New York. The answers were favorable to her claims, and determined the colony to maintain them. The revolutionary war happening soon after, suspended further proceedings until after the close.

In 1781, the two states agreed to appoint commissioners to determine the dispute. An act of congress was passed granting to these commissioners full powers to act in the final settling of this long pending controversy. The commissioners met at Trenton, in November, 1782. After a full hearing of the matter in question, they decided that Connecticut had no right to the lands in dispute. Here the matter, so far as Pennsylvania was concerned, rested.

The state of Connecticut, notwithstanding, still claimed to all lands lying west of Pennsylvania, and extending to the Mississippi river. To avoid future troubles, however, the legislature agreed to cede all of these lands to congress, with the exception of a tract of one hundred and twenty miles in length, lying immediately west of the west line of Pennsylvania. This cession was accepted, and was considered to be an indirect acknowledgment that her claim was well founded.

This tract is known as the Western Reserve, and includes the counties of Ashtabula, Trumbull, Portage, Geauga, Cuyahoga, Medina, Lorain, Huron and Erie. A part of the tract was granted by the state to the inhabitants of New London, Fairfield and Norwalk, whose property had been destroyed by the British troops during the war. The remainder was sold in 1795, and the money arising from the sale appropriated to the purpose of constituting a perpetual fund for the support of schools in the state. (Ohio City Transcript.)

THE BATTLE OF BRANDYWINE.

We had been in the saddle about an hour, under the intrepid Pulaski, who with his own hands, examined our swords, pistols and other equipments, as if assured that the struggle would be a deadly and a long continued one. The day was one of the most beautiful that ever broke over the earth. We were about half a mile from the main body, ranged along a green slope, facing the west, our horses about four hundred in number, standing as so many marble statues; until just as the eastern sky began to redden and adulate, and cloud after cloud to roll up and heave like a great curtain up the wind, and the whole heaven seemed discharging all its beauty and brightness upon one spot. I happened to turn about and saw the tall Pole (Pulaski) bare-headed, tilting his horse, like some valiant wrecker came up out of the solid earth to worship upon the very summit of the hill behind us; it might be, (for the noble carriage of the man, the martial bearing of the soldier, would permit of either interpretation, it might be in the awful employment of devotion or in the more earthly one of martial observation—but he suddenly reigned up his charger, shook the heavy dew from the horseman's cap, replaced it and leaped headlong down the hill, just as the bright dash passed away on the horizon; followed by a loud report, and the next instant a part of our ranks were covered with dust and turf, thrown up by a cannon ball that struck near the spot he had just left.

Our horses plucked up their ears at the sound, and all at once, as if a hundred trumpets were playing in the wind, came the enemy in his advance. Pulaski unsheathed his sword, called out a select body and set off at full gallop, to a more distant elevation, where we saw the enemy advancing in two columns; one under Knipphausen, which moved in steadiness, in a dark solid mass, towards the spot occupied by general Maxwell; the other, under Cornwallis, which seemed to threaten the right flank of the main body. Intelligence was immediately sent to Washington, and reinforcements called in, from the spot we had left.

We kept our position, awaiting for a whole hour the sound of conflict; at last a heavy volley rattled along the sky, a few moments passed, and then another followed, like a storm of drum heads. The whole air rung with it; another and another followed; then gradually increased in loudness, came peal after peal till it resembled a continual clap of thunder, rolling about under an illuminated vapor. But Pulaski, with all his impetuosity, was a general, and knew his duty too well to hazard any movement till he should be able to see with certainty the operations of the enemy in the valley below.

Meanwhile, several little parties which had been sent out, came in, one after the other, with the intelligence that Knyphausen had broken down upon Maxwell in magnificent style—been beaten back again; but that he had finally prevailed—and that Maxwell had retreated across the river. A thin vapor had risen from the earth below us and completely covered the enemy from our view. It was no longer possible to follow him, except by the sound of his tread, which we could feel in the solid earths, jarring ourselves and our horses; and now and then, a quick glimmering in the midst, as some standard raised above it, some weapon flourished, or some musket shot through it like a rocket.

About an hour after, a horseman dashed through the smoke on the very verge of the horizon, and after scouring the fields, for a whole mile in view, communicated with two or three others, who set off in different directions; one to us with orders to hurry down to the ford, where the commander-in-chief was determined to fall on Knyphausen with all his power before Cornwallis could come to his aid. It was a noble but hazardous game—and Pulaski, whose war horse literally thundered and lighted along the broken and stony precipice by which we descended, kept his eye wearily to the right as if not quite certain that the order would not be countermanded.

We soon fell in with general Greene who was posting all on fire, to give Knyphausen battle, and in the next moment saw Sullivan in full march over a distant hill towards the enemies flank. This arrangement would doubtless have proved fatal to Knyphausen, had not our operations been unfortunately arrested at the very moment we were prepared to fall upon him, man and horse, by the intelligence that Cornwallis had moved off to another quarter. It was a moment of irresolution—doubt, it was the death blow to our hopes to victory. Greene was recalled, and Sullivan commanded to halt.

Hardly had this happened, our horses being covered with sweat, and froth, fretting in the bit like chained tigers, and covered with dust, it being an excessively hot and sultry day, when a heavy cannonade was heard on our right flank, and Greene, to whose division we had been attached, was put into motion to support Sullivan who had left horse some hours before. The truth now broke upon us like a thunder clap. The enemy had passed us, concentrated, we supposed, and fallen on our right.

I shall never forget Green's countenance, when the news came,—he was on the road side, upon an almost perpendicular bank, but he wheeled where he was, dashed down the bank, his face white as the bleached marble, and called to us to gallop forward with such a tremendous impulse, that we marched four miles in forty minutes. We held on our way in a cloud of dust, and met Sullivan all in disorder; nearly a mile from the ground, retreating step by step at the head of his men, and shouting himself hoarse, covered with blood and sweat, and striving in vain to bring them to a stand, while Cornwallis was pouring in upon them an incessant volley.

Pulaski dashed out to the right, over the fences, and there stood awhile upright in his stirrups, reconnoitering, while the enemy, who appeared by the smoke and the dust that rolled before them in the wind to be much nearer than they really were, redoubled their efforts; but at last Pulaski saw a favorable opportunity. The column wheeled; the wind swept across their van, revealing them like a battalion of spirits, breathing fire and smoke. He gave the signal; Archibald repeated it; then Arthur; then myself. In three minutes we were ready for the word.

When Pulaski, shouting in a voice that thrilled through and through us, struck sparks into his charger; and in half a minute, so fierce and terrible was his charge, before we were able to come up to him. What can he mean? Gracious heaven! My hand convulsively, like that of a drowning man, reigned up for a moment when I saw that I was galloping straight forward into a field of bayonets; yet he was the first man! and who would not have followed.

We did follow him, and with such a hurricane of fire and steel, that when we wheeled, our path lay broad before us, with a wall of fire on the right hand and on the left; but not a bayonet or a blade in front except what were under the hoofs of our horses. My blood rushes now, like a flash of fire through my forehead, when I recall the devastation that we then made, almost to the very height of the enemy's column.

But Pulaski, he who afterwards rode into their entrenchments on horseback, sword in hand, was accustomed to it, and broken over the fence, aware of his peril if he should give them time to awake from their consternation, he wheeled in a blaze of fire with the intention of returning through a wall of death more perilous than that which shut in the children of Israel upon the Red sea.

But not the wall had rolled in upon us, and we were left no alternative but to continue as we had begun.

The undaunted Pole rioted in the excess of his joy! I remember well how he passed me, covered with sweat and dust, riding absolutely upon the very points of their bayonets. But at last they pressed upon him, and horsemen after horsemen fell from their saddles; when we were all faint and feeble, and even Archibald was fighting on foot over his beautiful horse, with Arthur battling over his head, we heard the cry of "Success! success!" Immediately we felt the enemy give way, leaving this way and that, finally concentrating beyond us.

"Once more! once more!" cried Pulaski, and away he went breaking in upon them as they were forming and traoping down whole platoons, in the charge, before a man could plant his bayonet or bring his gun to an aim; our aspect as we came thundering upon them was sufficient; the enemy fled, and we brought off our companions unhurt.

I have been in many a battle, many a one that made my hair afterwards stand when I dreamed of it—but never in one where carnage was so dreadful, and firing so incessant as that which followed the arrival of Greene. But the enemy had so effectually secured his exposed points by ranks of men kneeling with plated bayonets, that we could make no impression upon them, although we rode upon their faces and again, discharging our pistols in their faces.

MR. KING OF ALABAMA.

Mobile, May 24, 1839.

Hon. Wm. B. King: Sir: Your fellow citizens of Mobile, aware of your eminent public services in the station which for nearly twenty years you dignified and adorned, and entertaining the highest respect for your private character, have deputed us to invite you to a public dinner, to be given at such time as may best comport with your convenience. In accepting this invitation and naming a day that will be most agreeable to you, you will greatly oblige your numerous friends in this city.

We have the honor to remain your fellow citizens,

Mobile, May 26, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the invitation of my fellow citizens, of Mobile, to partake of a public dinner at such time as may suit my convenience. I can but regret that my arrangements will necessarily render my stay in Mobile so short that I am compelled to decline their flattering invitation, and to deprive myself of the pleasure of meeting them at the festive board. I cannot, however, be insensible to this manifestation of the personal respect and political confidence of my republican fellow citizens. It is the highest—and indeed it is the only reward for public service, worth, with me, a moment's consideration: for coming as it does from those distinguished for their intelligence and moral worth, it carries with it the strongest evidence that I have been faithful to the principles of the constitution, and with whatever ability I may possess, have honestly discharged the duties of the station in which for the last twenty years, it pleased my fellow citizens of Alabama to place me. From early life I have been identified with the republican party.—My youthful energies were exerted in sustaining those principles for which Jefferson, Madison, and the purest and wisest of our country contended.—With them I was opposed to alien and sedition laws; then; I am equally opposed to gag laws now. I was and ever have been opposed to the latitudinarian construction of the constitution. I believe with our democratic republican fathers, that the only security for the rights of the states was to be found in conferring the action of the general government to the powers expressly granted, and such incidental powers as were plainly and undeniably "necessary and proper," to carry the granted powers into effect.

I am, and ever have been, a state rights man; a strict constructionist; I hunt up no vagrant power, on which to bottom legislation, nor upon any supposed grounds of expediency, seek to extend the granted powers by implication. For a U. States bank, internal improvement, and a tariff for protection, I find no warrant in the constitution; hence I disregard all arguments, drawn from real or imaginary advantages; adhere to that sacred instrument, and oppose them all; for experience has shown that every departure has been attended with serious evils, and on more than one occasion has threatened to shake the government to its very foundations.

On a strict adherence to the provisions of the constitution, must depend the security of our most vital interests, the preservation of our dearest rights. It is the only effectual shield against the unprincipled efforts of those who would with a demonic spirit involve us in all the horrors of a servile war, and drench our fair field with blood, and should the day unfortunately ever arrive, when the powers of this government shall be placed, and retained, in the hands of those who would create a corporation, to strengthen the executive arm, and control the institutions of the states; impose taxes to enrich one branch of industry at the expense of all the others, and deprive our citizens of the freedom of speech; then will the days of this glorious and free republic be numbered. To the present truly republican administration I have given my most cordial support, and so long as it continues to administer the government upon the principles set forth by Mr. Van Buren, in his inaugural address, I shall unhesitatingly do so.

I regret, gentlemen, that neither time nor the limits of this letter, will enable me to give at large my reasons for supporting that much abused and misrepresented independent treasury plan. I know that untiring efforts have been, and are making, to mislead the public mind on that subject; but I also know that it is undergoing a thorough examination by an independent and enlightened people, and on their decision I rely with confidence.

Tender, gentlemen, to my republican fellow citizens my grateful acknowledgments for their distinguished attention, and accept for yourselves the assurance of my high respect and sincere regard. Your fellow citizen,
WM. R. KING.

THE CILLEY DUEL.

The following extract from a speech recently delivered by Mr. Graves to his constituents of Louisville, and reported in the Louisville Journal, throws some light upon the unhappy duel which was the subject of so much speculation at the time it occurred:—

"I met colonel Webb one day in Washington, and having experienced the most unkind and unmerciful civilities from him some time before in New York, during my visit to that city, I naturally felt disposed to extend to him that courtesy which one gentleman owes to another under similar circumstances. After talking to him for some time, he said that he had a favor to ask of me. I replied, that any thing which one gentleman might ask of another, and which I had it in my power to grant, I would cheerfully do for him. He then handed me a paper, and said he would feel greatly obliged if I would deliver that from him to Mr. Cilley. Aware of Mr. Cilley's previous remarks on colonel Webb, it instantly struck me that the paper was a challenge, and I hesitated to take it. I asked col. Webb whether it was a challenge, and told him that, if it was, I should decline having any thing to do with it, being opposed in principle, to duelling myself, and acting as the representative of a district which I believed to be opposed to it. I also told him that I was totally ignorant of the etiquette of duelling, and, therefore, a very unfit person, on that account, if I even had not insurmountable objections of another kind to prevent me from interfering. Col. Webb then assured me that the paper was not a challenge; that it was merely a note of inquiry, to which a definite answer was required. He also assured me that, if a challenge should subsequently be found necessary, he would employ some other person than myself to bear it. Upon these assurances, totally unconscious, as I was, that any possible mischief could arise out of my carrying a simple paper of intertigation from one gentleman to another, I took the note and went to THE WORKS. I sent one of the attending boys for Mr. Cilley, who came out to me, and I then told him that col. Webb had requested me to hand him that paper. He said he supposed it was a challenge, and that he could not receive any thing of the kind from colonel Webb. I told him that colonel Webb had assured me it was not a challenge, and with this assurance I had become the bearer of it; that I would not have consented to be the bearer of a challenge to him, as I had the kindest feelings towards him, and was opposed to duelling; but that I hoped he would consent to take the note, as I feared his refusal would place me in an embarrassing situation. I added that I was wholly ignorant of the etiquette in such cases, and had never contemplated or thought of such an event as his refusal to take the communication. He said he should be glad to have time to consult some friends on the propriety of his taking the communication; and I, thinking it advisable that I myself should inquire into the etiquette of my situation, agreed to receive next morning his answer whether he would take the paper or not. I left him then, and consulted my friends, Mr. Menefee, Mr. Crittenden, Mr. Wise, &c. on the subject. To my extreme regret, those gentlemen all confirmed my painful suspicions of the responsibility that would devolve upon me in the event of Mr. Cilley's persisting in his refusal to take for me the communication, of which I had innocently and unsuspectingly consented to be the bearer. The next morning I waited on Mr. Cilley for his answer. He told me that his friends had advised him not to accept any communication from colonel Webb; but he added that he had no objection in saying to me that he had no personal disrespect for colonel Webb, and had only spoken of him in debate according to the privileges of the house, without intending any thing of a personal or private nature. I conscientiously thought that this ought to be sufficient to satisfy col. Webb, and so expressed myself to Mr. Cilley. I left him, and consulted my friends, and was never more happy in my life than when they agreed with me in opinion that the declaration of Mr. Cilley ought to be regarded as satisfactory.

"We soon found, however, that some of Mr. Cilley's most violent political friends were impeaching my personal veracity by denying that he had made any admission at all in regard to the communication of offering me a personal disrespect to colonel Webb, and that he had said to me that his refusal to receive colonel Webb's note was predicated upon grounds having no connexion with the character and standing of that gentleman. I, therefore, in accordance with the advice of all my friends, again spoke to Mr. Cilley, and told him that what had passed between him and me had not been in the presence of a third person, and that I thought it might be proper that he should commit to writing what he had said to me in regard to colonel Webb, and place it in my hands. He said that he had not the slightest objection to doing so, and that he would retire to his room and send me the required writing forthwith. I took my seat in the house, and waited several hours, but did not receive the expected communication. Still resolved, however, to have every thing amicably adjusted, if possible, I again waited on Mr. C. in person, to remind him that he had neglected to send me the promised communication, of which he had said to me. He then told me that he had concluded, upon mature deliberation, that the better way would be for me to address him a note, making an inquiry as to the conversation that had passed between us upon the occasion in question; and that, if I would do this, he would make the promised response promptly and cheerfully. Without a moment's hesitation, I consented to do this, and instantly wrote the proposed inquiry, in as few words as possible; and, waiving all ceremony, (for I sincerely thought and fervently hoped that all difficulty was at an end), presented, in person, my note, marked in the testimony No. 1, to Mr. Cilley. He said he would forward me his reply as speedily as possible. Soon afterwards, I saw him in conversation with Dr. Duncan and others, and, subsequently, his reply, marked No. 2 in the testimony, was handed to me by Dr. Duncan.

"Upon receiving that most unexpected note, I read its contents in the face of Dr. Duncan as distinctly as I afterwards read them in the face of myself. I saw that Mr. Cilley, notwithstanding all his verbal promises to me, was disposed to confound an imputation upon my veracity, and hence I felt it my duty again to consult my friends. Acting entirely under their guidance—the guidance of men whose honor, whose pacific disposition, and whose aversion to blood the world has never doubted—I wrote the note marked No. 3 in the testimony. I charged my friends and advisers, while they were framing that note, to consult my honor, and, through me, the honor of the state which I represented, without any reference whatever to my personal safety, which I could not, in the slightest degree, allow to be consulted when my honor and that of my state were concerned. They and I felt equally that I could not take any other steps than those actually adopted, without backing out of the affair disgracefully and dishonorably. I had fully learned the responsibility of my situation. Gentlemen of the highest honor had informed me of the etiquette, which, till then, I was ignorant of, and I could not for a moment hesitate between the alternatives of honor and disgrace. I then felt, as I now feel, that it would be far better for me to lay down my life than to risk my own honor and the honor of Kentucky. (Great cheering.) I still feel that it would have been far better for me and for you that I should have fallen on that occasion, than that one foul stain should have been reflected on you through your representative. (Great cheering.) True, I was, and am—I have always been—opposed, in principle, to duelling. I was wholly inexperienced—totally ignorant of its etiquette and code; but those on whose experience and high sense of honor I could faithfully rely, were my advisers; and I did not hesitate one instant in placing myself entirely at their disposal. I promptly told those friends not to suffer their conduct in the business to be influenced, in the slightest degree, by any thing that could, in the most remote manner, tarnish my fame or the credit of the state, which had honored me with its confidence and trust. I had never handled a duelling pistol with hostile views in my life. I had ever detested the idea of practising with pistols to acquire dexterity in their use, from a feeling of decided disapprobation. From my very boyhood I had been imbued with a detestation of the practice. And, with regard to rifle shooting, I do not think I had ever fired half a dozen shots without a rest, and even with that I had but indifferent success. My opponent, on the contrary, was well skilled with both weapons, and confident of success. The chances were entirely against me, yet I did not hesitate one moment. We met at a time, place and distance, and with weapons, all of his own choosing, and the result is known to all; it would be painful to dwell upon it longer. If I erred in what I did, it was because I could not see how it was possible for me to act otherwise. I felt assured, and I still feel assured, however deeply I deplore, and must ever deplore, the fatal event, that the stars were conspired to take were in conformity with the best advice and opinions of great men, whose sense of honor and propriety is unquestioned.

"I thank you, fellow-citizens, for the patience and attention with which you have honored me. If you think that you can still repose in me the same confidence and the same trust as heretofore, I shall not fail, on my part, to merit that confidence, and to preserve your honor with my own, or yield up your trust when I cannot maintain both untarnished." (Great cheering.)

RECEPTION OF MR. CLAY AT BUFFALO, NEW YORK.

From the Commercial Advertiser and Journal.
Below are the addresses of the hon. H. J. Stow, in behalf of the city, and the reply of the distinguished senator, at the Park, on the occasion of his visit, on Wednesday, the 17th inst. It is due to Mr. Stow to say, that the report of his remarks by no means does justice to his really able and eloquent address.

MR. CLAY—Sir: The municipal authorities and people of this city, ever ready to extend courtesy and hospitality to strangers, have made it my pleasant duty, on this occasion, to express their sentiments and feelings towards a statesman whom they, as men, as freemen, as Americans, have been accustomed to honor and respect.

We have, indeed, for years, fondly anticipated the day when we could assure him, personally, of the regard for one whom, though separated by distance, has been bound to us by ties as sacred as those that gather round our homes.—For such are the emotions diffused by generous patriotism, that we feel a friendship towards, and attachment for—nay, almost an intimacy with those who have rendered service to our country.

We say that we have anticipated that day, because we believe that if there be any part of our wide-spread country more peculiarly than any other, deserving the curiosity of even a stranger, it will be found in our immediate vicinity. We think that perhaps in no part of all the earth has the Creator impressed upon his work such evidences of his beneficence and power. But, to an American, there are connected with these scenes recollections scarcely less attractive than are the works of nature to a foreigner and stranger.

Were we not justified, sir, in our anticipations, had we not a right to expect that the eloquence, which has so often reverberated alike on the Mississippi and Niagara, would have drawn fresh inspiration from "these mighty scenes in nature's morning made?"

Could we have supposed that you would have so long forborne the gratification of viewing those fields rendered memorable in that conflict, the successful progress and termination of which owed so much to your own exertions?

We will not, however, speak of past disappointments. We now, with warm hearts and ready hands, greet your visit to our city; and trust you will here find a reception which shall remind you of a western welcome and a happy home. But, sir, gratitude must not be lost in the gratulations of the day. We must recur, for one moment, to the past. We must allude to the time when all there was of this city, all there remained on this frontier, of man's works, became the spoils of war. And though it is with pain we call to your attention our past sufferings, it is with gratitude we now seize the hand which was raised for our relief; it is with pride and pleasure we hear the voice which invoked for us assistance in the day of our distress.

We cannot, sir, contemplate with pride, as we do, our rising city, its increasing population, its spreading commerce, and its excellent, though, to a great extent, artificial harbor, without being often reminded of the distinguished advocate of the cause of domestic industry and internal improvements.

Nor can we, sir, speak of the prosperity of the new states, on which so much of our own future greatness must depend, without expressing our approbation of the system in regard to the public domain, which you have proposed.

As citizens of an old state, and one of the states, too, which contributed largely to the national domain, we have witnessed, with peculiar gratification, the disinterested patriotism which induced you, a resident of a western and comparatively new state, to guard the common property of all.

It is to the same patriotic spirit, however we may differ as to expediency, we attribute your exertions to compromise the two differences which have threatened the integrity of our union?

It is the same magnanimity of mind which has induced you, sir, to sustain the cause of suffering humanity in every quarter of the globe—which gave courage and countenance to reviving freedom on the plains of Marathon and Plataea—which has caused your voice to be heard wherever liberty has needed aid from the country of her birth, to where "Cortes and Pizarro's arrow flew."

Here, on this spot, two years ago this day, we received and welcomed your great compatriot, the "defender of the constitution." And, sir, it is fitting that we thus honor those who have done so much to honor us. For the sake of our children, for the benefit of our whole community, as an example for representatives, as friends, as freemen, we welcome HENRY CLAY.

MR. RECORDER AND FELLOW-CITIZENS: The journey which has brought me in the midst of you, was undertaken to afford me an opportunity which I had long desired, to see, and enjoy, the beauties of viewing some of the lakes, the country bordering upon them, the wonderful cataract in your neighborhood, and the Canadas—I had no wish, during its performance, to attract public attention, or to be the object of any public demonstrations. I expected, indeed, to meet, and I take great pleasure in acknowledging that I have every where met with individual kindness, personal respect, and friendly consideration. But, although it is my wish to pass on quietly without display or parade, I am penetrated with sentiments of gratitude for the manifestations of attachment and confidence with which I am honored in this beautiful city of the lakes. I thank you, most cordially thank you, for them all.

I am happy to learn that the public measures to which, in the national councils, I have rendered my humble support—here have commanded your approbation. The first of these, in time and importance, was the last war with Great Britain—upon its causes, and upon its results, we may look back with entire satisfaction. In surveying this theatre of gallant distinction upon the lakes and upon their shores, I have felt my bosom swell with patriotic pride. Nor can any one fail to recollect the names of Brown and Scott, and Porter and Harrison, and Shelby and Perry, and their brave comrades, who so nobly sustained the honor, and added to the glory of our country. And it is most gratifying to behold the immense augmentation, on this frontier, of its military strength and security, since the last war. The satisfaction which is derived from witnessing the tranquillity which now prevails on our border, would be complete if we were not forced to recollect that the violation of our territorial jurisdiction, in the case of the Caroline, remains to be satisfactorily atoned for.

During the progress of that war, as in the war of the revolution, cut off from the usual supplies of European fabrics, our armies and our population generally were subjected to extreme privations and offerings. It appeared to me, upon its termination, that the wisdom of government was called upon to guard against the recurrence of the evil, and to place the security and prosperity of the country upon a sure basis. Hence, I concurred; most heartily, in the policy of protecting American manufactures, for a limited time, against foreign competition. Whatever diversity of opinion may have existed as to the propriety of that policy originally, I think that all candid men must now admit that it has placed this country at least half a century in advance of the position in which it would have been without its adoption. The value of a home, as well as of a foreign market, is incalculable. It may be illustrated by a single example. Suppose the three hundred thousand bales of cotton now manufactured in the United States, were thrown into the glutted markets of Europe, who can estimate the reduction in the price of that great staple which would be the inevitable consequence?

The compromise of the tariff was proposed to preserve our manufactures from impending ruin threatened by the administration of general Jackson, and which would have been inflicted at the succeeding session, and to avert from the union the threatened danger of civil war. If the compromise be invariably maintained, as I think it ought to be, trust that the rate of duty for which it provides, in conjunction with the stipulations for cash duties, our valuations, and the long list of free articles, inserted for the benefit of the manufacturing interest, will insure it reasonable and adequate protection.

Intimately connected with the strength, the prosperity, and the union of our country was that policy of internal improvements of which you have expressed approbation. The national road and the great canal, projected or executed by your Clinton, both having the same object of connecting the eastern and western portion of the union, have diffused a spirit throughout the land which has impelled the several states to undertake the accomplishment of most of the works which ought to be performed by the present generation. And after the distribution of the large surplus recently made from the common treasury, but little now remains for the general government directly to do, on this great subject, except those works which are intended to provide, on navigable waters, for the security of commerce and navigation, and the completion of the Cumberland road.

I have been very glad, during my voyage upon this lake, to find that an erroneous impression had existed in the mind of the proprietors of the barriors. I had feared that the expenditure of public money had been often wasteful and unnecessary upon works on the lake shores. There are, probably, a few instances in which it might have been properly avoided; but I am now fully persuaded that, in the general, the expenditure has been necessary, wise and salutary.

In sustaining the great systems of policy to which I have just adverted, I was actuated by the paramount desire which has influenced me throughout my whole public career of reserving, in all its integrity and vigor, our happy union. In it is comprehended, peace, safety, free institutions and all that constitutes the pride and hope of our country. If we lift the veil beyond it, we must start back with horror at the scenes of disorder, anarchy, war and despotism which rise up before us.

And it is most proper and expedient to leave the case of the several states, those internal improvements, within their respective limits, which are the wants of society require, there is no great and lasting resource to which I think them fairly entitled. The public domain has accomplished the object to which it was dedicated by our revolutionary fathers, in satisfying the land bounties which were granted to the officers and soldiers of the war of independence, and contributing to the extinction of the national debt. It is in danger of being totally lost, by loose and improvident legislation; and under the plausible pretext of benefiting the poor, of laying, in the hands of speculators, the foundations of principalities. I have thought that the net products of the public domain should be equitably divided among all the states. In their hands the fund would assist in the execution of those great and costly works which many of them are unable to undertake, and some find it difficult to complete. The withdrawal of the fund from the hands to which it is devoted, and the corrupting influences which it exerts, fluctuating as the revenues, from year to year, would scarcely be felt by the general government in its legitimate operations, and would serve to impress upon it the performance of the necessary duty of economy and strict accountability.

This is not a suitable occasion, and, perhaps, I do not fit person to expatiate here, on the condition of our public affairs; but I trust that I shall be excused for saying a few words to those who concur in opinion with me, without intending the slightest offence to any present, if there be any present, from whom it is my misfortune to differ. We believe that there is a radical mal-administration of the government; that great interests of the country are trodden down; that new and dangerous principles and practices have been introduced and continued; that a fearful conjunction of the purse and the sword in the same hands, already alarmingly strong, is perseveringly attempted; that the constitution has been grossly violated; and that by the vast accumulation of executive power, actual and meditated, our system is rapidly tending towards an elective monarchy. These are our convictions, honestly and sincerely entertained. They prescribe to us the duties which we have to perform towards our country.—To correct past evils and to avert impending dangers we see no effectual remedy but in a change of our rulers. The opposition constitutes the majority—unquestionably the majority of—the nation. A great responsibility, therefore, attaches to it. If defeated, it will be defeated by its own divisions, and not by the merits of the principles of its opponent. These divisions are, at the same time, our weakness and his strength.

Are we not then called upon Mr. Recorder and fellow-citizens, by the highest duties to our country, to rise free institutions, to posterity, and to the world, to free above all local prejudices and personal partialities, to discard all collateral questions, to disregard every subordinate point, and in a genuine spirit of compromise and concession, uniting hand and hand, to preserve for ourselves the blessings of a free government, wisely, honestly and faithfully administered, and, as we received them from our fathers, to transmit them to our children? Should we not justly subject ourselves to eternal reproach, if we permitted our differences about mere men to bring defeat upon our country? Our principles are indelible, but men have but a fleeting existence, and are themselves liable to change and corruption during its brief continuance.

If my name creates any obstacle to cordial union and harmony, away with it and concentrate upon some individual more acceptable to all branches of the opposition. What is a public man worth who is not ever ready to sacrifice himself for the good of his country? I have unreflectingly desired retirement. I yet desire it when, consistently with the duties and obligations which I owe, I can honorably retire. No veteran soldier, covered with scars and wounds, inflicted in many severe battles, and hard campaigns, ever received his discharge with more pleasure than I should mine. But I think that like him, without presumption, I am entitled to an honorable discharge.

In conclusion, Mr. Recorder, allow me to express to the city government, through you, my respectful and especial acknowledgments for its liberal tender of the hospitalities of the city; and to you my thanks for the friendly and flattering manner in which you have communicated it.

GOVERNOR EVERETT'S LETTER

TO THE YOUNG WIVES OF GREENFIELD.

Wate-town, 23th June, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: I have received your letter of the 14th instant, requesting me in behalf of the young men's association of Greenfield, to join them in the approaching celebration of the fourth of July. I feel myself under great obligations to you for this invitation; but as the executive council holds a stated quarterly session, in the first week of July, it will be out of my power to leave Boston at that time.

You will be pleased to accept my thanks for the favorable estimate, you are kind enough to place on my public services. Individually, I can claim no merit, but that of having zealously exerted myself to serve the commonwealth, to the best of my ability. But it may be justly claimed for the course of policy, established by all the branches of the government under my respected predecessors, and not knowingly departed from by me, that it has eminently promoted the prosperity and sustained the character of the commonwealth. The greater part of the most important public concerns is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the general government; and Massachusetts, in common with her sister states, has of late years suffered deeply from causes not within her own control. But in every case within the sphere of reach which the state government may be truly affirmed that her citizens have for years enjoyed, and are now enjoying as large a share of prosperity as falls to the lot of man. The rich inheritance of blessings received from our forefathers has been faithfully administered; and the pure principles of representative republican gov-vernment, which they transmitted to us, have been steadily adhered to. A liberal and enlightened spirit of reform has pervaded our legislation; the statute law has been revised, and some of its harsh provisions softened, and a commencement has been made of reducing the common law, as far as crimes and punishments are concerned, to a uniform written text. The culture of the soil has been encouraged; the natural resources of the commonwealth have been explored and developed; and our territory, for the first time has been scientifically surveyed. The buildings requisite to the improved penitentiary discipline have been erected at the state's prison; the state lunatic hospital has been founded and supported; other institutions of a more beneficial character,—hospitals, asylums, and infirmaries,—have been liberally patronized by the state; a productive school fund has been established, and the public countenance especially extended to the cause of popular education. Not only have these and various other objects of public utility been effected within the last few years, without recourse to taxation, but the usual direct tax, which had been levied from the settlement of the country, has ceased to be laid; while at the same time, the support of the courts of probate, a considerable portion of the expenses of the administration of justice, and the expenses of legislation, (all of which were formerly charged upon the people,—the last named article being at the present time by far the heaviest item of public expenditure) have been defrayed from the treasury.

But the most important feature of the policy which has prevailed of late years, remains to be stated. The credit of the commonwealth has been judiciously and efficiently applied in aid of the construction of rail roads which will soon establish a direct connection for business and travel between the western shores of Michigan and the seacoast of Massachusetts. In two or three years, we shall have direct access to that vast system of communication natural and artificial, which exists in New York, and the states and territories northwest of the Ohio, to an extent unequalled on the surface of the globe. The accomplishment of this object will form an era in the history of the commonwealth. No anticipations have as yet been formed at all, adequate to its importance. It will be felt in the increased prosperity of every section of the state, and will infuse new life into every branch of our industry. By the construction of the western rail road and the late branches already in progress of contemplation, (one of which will unquestionably pursue the line of Connecticut river), Massachusetts will reap her share of the fruit of the stupendous appropriations for canals and rail roads, and of the immense capital invested in steam navigation on the lakes,—by New York, and the states and territories west,—which was largely as if those appropriations and investments had been made for her territory, or a plan projected by ourselves. By the loan of the state's credit to the amount of four or five millions of dollars, (the immediate effect of which is in a high degree beneficial, in applying that amount of foreign capital to the employment and reward of domestic labor and industry), we connect ourselves with a system of public works, on which not less than seventy five millions of dollars will have been expended. All this is effected without taxation; without imposing the burden of a dollar on the people of the commonwealth; and such I am rejoiced to say, is the reliance placed in Europe on the stability of our councils, on our resources, and our good faith, that notwithstanding the attempts made among us, (thoughtlessly I trust), for party purpose, to shake the public credit, by statements of the financial condition of the commonwealth utterly destitute of truth, the stocks of Massachusetts continue to command the highest price paid for American securities in London.

The prosperous condition of the commonwealth, is well adapted to awaken devout thankfulness to Providence, and a grateful remembrance of the services and sacrifices of our revolutionary sires. It forms a just subject of contemplation for the day you celebrate. Deeply regretting that I cannot have the pleasure of listening with you to the eloquent, accomplished and patriotic citizen, whom you have selected as your orator, and of joining with you in the rational festivities of the occasion, I remain, gentlemen, with great respect, your obliged friend. EDWARD EVERETT.

NEW HAMPSHIRE AND THE SUB-TREASURY, PUBLIC LANDS, &c.

In the house of representatives of the New Hampshire on Saturday the 6th of July last, Mr. Wells, from the select committee to which he was referred, so much of the governor's message as relates to the keeping and disbursing of the public revenue, made a report accompanied by the following resolutions, which were subsequently passed in both houses, by large majorities, and approved by the governor.

1. Resolved by the senate and house of representatives in general court convened, That in the opinion of this legislature, all connection between banking corporations and the government of the U. States should be dissolved.

2. And be it further resolved, That in the opinion of this legislature, no medium or currency should be received in payment of the revenues of the general government except gold and silver.

3. And be it further resolved, That in the opinion of this legislature, the independent treasury is the only system for receiving, paying and disbursing the public revenue, recognized by the constitution of the United States.

4. And be it further resolved, That the senators from this state in the congress of the United States be instructed, and the representatives requested, to use all proper exertions to effect the adoption of the independent treasury.

5. And be it further resolved, That the secretary of state be required to transmit a certified copy of these resolutions to each senator and representative from this state in the congress of the U. States.

The following has also passed both branches of the legislature, and been approved by the governor.

Whereas certain propositions have been before the congress of the United States, having for their object the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of public lands, and whereas such a measure in the opinion of this legislature, is not only unconstitutional, but is calculated to diminish the public revenue and increase indirect taxation, by affording a pretext for the continuance of a high tariff, therefore,

Resolved by the senate and house of representatives in general court convened, That our senators in congress be instructed, and the representatives from this state be requested to oppose every attempt which shall be made to divide the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several states, or to make any other disposition thereof except for the constitutional purpose of providing for the common welfare and general defence of the United States.

And be it further resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to furnish each of the senators and representatives in congress from this state, with a copy of this resolution.

Mr. Swasey introduced the following joint resolutions:

Whereas the legislature of this state, are, and ought to be sovereign within the territorial jurisdiction thereof;

And whereas the legislature of this state, exercising the authority delegated temporarily by said sovereign, is not bound to enact such laws as the rights, interests, and well-being of the state demands;

And whereas the rights, interests and well-being of the people of the state demand, that all bodies associate or corporate within the limits of this same, and of whatever name, and for what purpose created, be subject to the laws thereof;

And whereas no legislature of the state has, or ever had, under its present constitution, any right or power to enact any general or special law, or grant any act of incorporation which a subsequent legislature duly constituted, may not, and of right ought not, to alter, amend or abrogate whenever the public good shall require such alteration, amendment or abrogation.

Therefore, be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives in general court convened, That from and after the passage of this resolution, it shall be deemed lawful and competent for the legislature of this state, to alter, amend or abrogate any act of incorporation heretofore granted, or which may hereafter be granted, under or by the laws thereof, or which is, or may be found to exist within the territorial jurisdiction of the same, under any name, and for any purpose whatever, when in the opinion of the legislature the public good may require such alteration, amendment or abrogation to the contrary notwithstanding. Provided, however, that whenever the legislature shall abrogate as aforesaid, any act of incorporation heretofore granted, and in which the right of such abrogation is not declared, then, and in that case, if the personal rights of individuals are injuriously affected by such abrogation, the legislature, upon due information thereof, shall make such provision for compensating such individuals for said injuries, as justice and equity may demand.

RECEPTION OF MR. ELLIS.

U. S. Frigate Constitution, near Vera Cruz, Mexico, June 19th, 1839.

MY DEAR SIR: I take pleasure in saying to you, that we arrived here on the 17th inst. all well. Salutes were exchanged between this ship and the city of Vera Cruz; a customary thing with nations holding friendly intercourse with each other.

The hon. Mr. Ellis was landed this morning, with the national honors usual on such occasions—a salute of 17 guns, and manning the yards, with the crew nicely dressed in white, and standing up on the yards, supported by the life lines, while the salute is being fired. He was accompanied on shore by commodore Claxton, and five of the lieutenants, as his aids or suite. There were three boats fitted up in the best man-of-war style; the first, with judge Ellis, commodore Claxton and the flag lieutenant; the second, four lieutenants of the ship; the third, two of the "young gentlemen," (this is the man-of-war title for the midshipmen.)

On landing at the quay, they were received by the American consul and the American merchants, from whence we passed up to the residence of Mr. Ad and received his hospitality in a glass of wine. At this place, our minister was waited on by the aid of the governor, and was tendered a guard of honor, for the protection of his person and property, and to escort him to the city of Mexico. This is one of those civil things which tend to give evidence of the friendly feelings that are entertained for us by the Mexican government; for doubtless, gen. Victoria had his instructions from his government, and coming from a man like gen. V. who, it will be remembered, was the first president of the Mexican republic, and the only one that has served out his full term, it is but reasonable to believe there was much sincerity in it.—He is said to have been placed in his present position, for his law knowledge, and statesmanlike qualifications, as well as for his gallant bravery as a soldier. I was present at the official interview of our minister and commodore with the governor, and can therefore tell you that I was favorably impressed with the various qualities of the man; he is about 5 feet 9 or 10 inches high, with a stoop in his walk, occasioned by lameness in one leg, some 55 or 60 years of age, with a fine head, well covered with rich rolling locks of black hair, somewhat bleached by the many sunny days of a tropical climate, and the fatigues of war and diplomacy. These combinations are enough to produce the knitted brow and wrinkled front of any man, who has lived to the age of 60 years or more. The interview between judge Ellis, commodore Claxton, and gen. Victoria, was very gratifying, leaving an impression on my mind, that Mexico was an honorable debtor, and that she would pay to our citizens, through the government, all just claims they have against her. When fully satisfied of the justice of the claims, I doubt not but that speedy arrangements will be made for the liquidation of them, and the adjustment of all differences. Then will come a renewal of all those friendly relations which should exist between the two republics, and which would tend so much to the interest of both countries.

After the interview, we returned to the lodgings of judge Ellis, took our leave of him, and returned to the ship. Judge E. expressed himself to me in warm terms on the pleasures of the passage from New York, and the continued kindness and attention he had received. I cannot but say to you, that I was very much pleased with the judge—a gentleman of elegant manners, and agreeable in conversation—just such a minister as is every way suited to make a passage in a man-of-war, pleasant to himself, and agreeable to all. [U. S. Gazette.]

THE NEW BANKS OF NEW YORK.

The following letter and proposition explain an arrangement entered into by the new banks, for the redemption of country bills. By this arrangement, they will bear a uniform and regular rate of discount in this city:

New York, July 17, 1839.

In pursuance of a resolution of the convention representing a portion of the state security banks, organized under the general banking law of this state, held at Syracuse on the 26th inst. the undersigned met in this city on the 11th inst. to ascertain and recommend the most favorable and judicious arrangement for redeeming the notes of the country associations.

The convention at Syracuse had scarcely adjourned, when the three associated banks in this city, who have hitherto redeemed the notes of the safety fund banks of the interior, issued a notice to the country institutions that the existing arrangements for the redemption of their notes would be terminated at the end of thirty days. It is stated in the circular issued by the redeeming banks in the city, that it is beyond their ability to furnish the large amount of funds required to maintain the redemption of country paper under the arrangement of 1838, renewed in May, 1839. This sudden and unexpected announcement naturally produced an unpleasant state of alarm and apprehension, and aggravated the existing embarrassments in the money market, which had already assumed a most serious character. In the endeavors of the committee to discharge the duties imposed upon them, difficulties have been encountered which could not have been anticipated by the convention at Syracuse. All the propositions which we have been enabled to obtain from the city institutions, require that the state security banks in the country should place funds in deposit with their correspondents here, in advance, sufficient at all times to redeem their notes as they may concentrate in the city for redemption.

Notwithstanding the unfavorable condition of financial affairs at the present moment, the committee are unanimous in the opinion that it is expedient for all the banks organized under the general banking law, to provide funds for the redemption of their notes in this city, at a discount equal to the ordinary rate of exchange. It is difficult, and, indeed, impracticable, to fix an arbitrary and uniform rate of discount, which shall be strictly equal in regard to all the local institutions of the state. In order to attain that degree of uniformity which the public interest dictates, a spirit of mutual concession must predominate. In determining the precise rate to be recommended to the country banks, the committee have experienced much doubt and embarrassment. After a full consideration of the subject in its various points of light, we have resolved to recommend that all the state security banks provide funds for the redemption of their notes in this city, at a discount not exceeding three-fourths of one per cent. Although institutions in near proximity with the city may furnish a just exception, it is believed the rate proposed does not exceed the usual and average exchange in respect to institutions located in the interior of the state.

We have endeavored to obtain the most favorable terms for the country associations, whose interest we represent. To this end, propositions were solicited from several of the city banks, and offers have been received from the North American Trust and Banking company, the Atlantic bank, and the American Exchange bank. The proposition of the North American Trust and Banking company, which is hereto annexed, has been selected by the committee as the most favorable and advantageous to the country banks.

Independently of the rate of discount proposed on notes presented for redemption by individual holders, the committee deem it advisable to recommend that the notes of the state security banks which may be remitted to the city by the country banks, including remittances from the safety fund banks, shall be redeemed at a discount of one-half of one per cent. on being regularly assorted, sealed up and presented to our city correspondent. On this subject we have conferred with the committee now in session in this city, representing the safety fund banks, and they have signified their assent to this proposition. They have also consented that the messenger employed by the safety fund bank shall carry remittances and packages for such of the state security banks as shall pay $50 per annum towards the expense of the messenger.

In conclusion, the committee respectfully recommend that the foregoing propositions be carried into effect by each of the state security banks. It is confidently believed that the proposed system of redemption at the great commercial centre of the country, and the public confidence in the soundness and security of our issues, will insure the notes of the new banks perfect credit and a wide circulation throughout the union.

Proposition of the North American Trust and Banking company. The North American Trust and Banking company propose to the committee representing the state security banks of this state, to open an account with those banks, and redeem their notes at such rates as they may direct. The North American Trust and Banking company will allow an interest of five per cent. on balances to be made up once in each week, and the interest to be credited semi-annually, and will charge one-eighth of one per cent. as a compensation for redeeming notes of the country institutions, which are to be sealed up and held subject to their order. The expense and risk attending the transmission of notes to be borne exclusively by the several banks. It being understood that sufficient cash is at to be kept on deposit with the North American Trust and Banking company, by each of the several banks, to meet such redemption.

Collections will be made by the North American Trust and Banking company, at the current rates.

DECLINE OF SOUTHERN COMMERCE.

The report of a committee of the southern convention, which was held last April, in Charleston, furnishes the following table, showing the comparative progress of commerce at the north and south:—
 The statistics of the United States enable us to present the following statements, exhibiting at one view the rise, progress and decay of southern commerce. They are extracted from one of the documents formerly published by this convention, and show that the time was when the people of the south were the largest importers in the country.

In 1769, the value of the imports of the several colonies was as follows:—

Of Virginia,	£851,140 sterling.
New England States,	561,000 "
New York,	189,000 "
Pennsylvania,	400,000 "
South Carolina,	555,000 "

The exports were in about the same proportion: Virginia exporting nearly four times as much as New York; and South Carolina nearly twice as much as New York and Pennsylvania together; and five times as much as all the New England states united.

The same relative proportion of imports is preserved until the adoption of the federal constitution, when we find them to be, in the year 1791, as follows:—

Of New York,	$3,222,000
Virginia,	2,486,000
South Carolina,	1,520,000

There are no data to show the imports into the several states from the year 1791 to 1820; but the general fact may be assumed that the import trade of New York and other northern states has been constantly progressing, while that of Virginia and South Carolina has as regularly diminished. From 1821 to the present time, we have sufficient data, and they exhibit the following as the state of the import trade:

New York,	Virginia,	South Carolina.
1821,	$23,000,000	$1,078,000	$3,000,000
1822,	35,000,000	864,000	2,000,000
1823,	29,000,000	681,000	2,000,000
1824,	36,000,000	639,000	2,400,000
1825,	49,000,000	533,000	2,150,000
1827,	39,000,000	431,000	1,200,000
1829,	43,000,000	375,000	1,240,000
1832,	57,000,000	550,000	1,213,000

Thus, the import trade of New York has gradually increased from £189,000 sterling, about $340,000, in the year 1769, and from about three millions of dollars in 1791, to the enormous sum, in 1832, of fifty-seven millions of dollars!—While Virginia has fallen off in her import trade, from two and a half millions of dollars in 1791, to $375,000 in 1829, and $550,000 in 1832—not a great deal more than the freight of half a dozen ships.

From these calculations, a few curious facts appear. The imports of New York were, in 1832, nearly twenty times as great as they were in 1769, and nearly twenty times more than they were in 1791. Virginia, on the other hand, imported, in 1829, about one eleventh of what she did in 1769, and about one-seventh of what she did in 1791. In a period, too, of eight years, the aggregate imports of New York amounted to three hundred and eleven millions of dollars; those of South Carolina to about sixteen millions! and those of Virginia to about five millions! New York imported, therefore, in 1832, eleven times as much as Virginia did in eight years preceding, and nearly four times as much as South Carolina did in eight years preceding. Again, New York imported in one year (1832) nearly fifty times as much as South Carolina in the same year, and about 110 times as much as Virginia.

DUTY ON WHALE OIL.

In reply to the memorial from the merchants and others of New Bedford, caused by judge Story's decision respecting a duty on whale oil, the secretary of the treasury communicates the following, which we copy from the New Bedford Mercury of the 16th inst:

Treasury department, 6th July, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: Your memorial to the president of the United States has been returned by him to this department.

He approves the views taken in the circulars of the comptroller, and in my letter to you of the 27th, and especially of the proposed remission of the foreign duties. That will leave the whole matter in a fiscal view as it stood before the late judicial decision.

He has not been able to discover any further relief that can be properly afforded by the executive.— But the inconvenience of applying to the department for remission, which will still remain, and that only, connected with the revenue, can be lessened, though it cannot be avoided entirely, till new legislation is had, or the judicial decision before mentioned is over-ruled by some other court.

All the officers of the customs will be expected, and doubtless will be happy to facilitate as much as possible, the steps which those interested may find it necessary to take to procure relief, and I feel assured that as little delay and cost will be required in any quarter as are consistent with the law.

In respect to the influence of the late decision on the safety of the whale ships abroad and the discipline of their crews, it must be obvious, that the executive cannot properly interfere with the administration of the laws whether for civil or criminal liabilities, as between individuals or companies engaged in the fisheries.

But I have no hesitancy in expressing the opinion that our national vessels and consular and diplomatic officers will afford every protection in their power to American citizens and to what is in fact and good faith American property—though by inadvertence not accompanied by such papers as the circuit court have decided to be necessary and proper under particular acts of congress.

Should you consider this last suggestion of sufficient importance to have new instructions sent abroad to that effect by the state and navy departments, I entertain no doubt they will be cheerfully issued on your writing to those departments for the purpose.

In the meantime the apprehension entertained by some, that the crews of vessels departing from the United States under enrollment and licence, would, at the end of a year, be legally absolved from their engagements, is not supposed by this department to be well founded. But on the contrary the 6th section of the act of 18th of February, 1793, independent of any engagement under the act of July 20, 1790, is believed to preserve, under certain prescribed declarations of the master, all rights and privileges till the arrival of the vessel in the United States. Respectfully yours,

LEVI WOODBURY, sec. of the treasury.

NEW COTTON CIRCULAR.

From the Macon (Geo.) Messenger, July 20.

At a large and very respectable meeting of the citizens of the city of Macon, called to take into consideration the annexed circular, addressed to the cotton planters, merchants, factors, and presidents and directors of the several banks of the southern states, Isaac G. Seymour, mayor of the city, was called to the chair, and Washington Poe, appointed secretary.

The chairman after stating the object of the meeting, proceeded to read the said circular—after which the following resolutions were offered by Abson H. Chappell, esq. and seconded by Mr. Jerry Cowles, and unanimously adopted by the meeting.

Resolved, As the opinion of this meeting, that cotton, the great staple of the southern and southwestern part of the union, having become in a very eminent degree, the controlling commodity of the commercial world, and the influence which it exercises over the agricultural and commercial prosperity of our own country, and especially of the cotton growing region of it, being of the most absolute and paramount character. Therefore, it peculiarly behooves the citizens of the southern and southwestern states, earnestly to deliberate whether any and what system can be applied to the cotton trade, (that shall import to it greater steadiness and certainty, and secure to the commodity, with at least some approach to uniformity, what may be properly called its due and natural price—that is to say, a price based on the proportion of the annual supply to the annual demand of consumption—thereby protecting it as far as possible from those violent, ruinous and incalculable fluctuations which are of such frequent occurrence, and which are in numerous instances, the direct offspring of artificial causes and combinations.

Resolved further, That this meeting concur in the views set forth in the circular which has been read to the meeting from the chair, and that we believe the measures therein recommended, are sanative in their character, and if carried out as contemplated, will be conducive to the interest of the cotton growing states, and therefore, should commend themselves to the consideration of every citizen of the south, whatever may be his calling or profession.

Resolved, That fully appreciating the compliment bestowed upon our city, in selecting it as the place of meeting for the proposed convention, we do most cordially, and earnestly solicit our fellow citizens of the southern and southwestern states and the territory of Florida, to meet at this place on the fourth Tuesday in October next, to deliberate on the important matters disclosed in the before mentioned circular.

Resolved, That a committee to be composed of twenty-one, be appointed by the chair, to effect the object embraced in the last resolution, and that said committee have full power to adopt such measures as to them may seem proper to obtain a full meeting of all interested in the subject set forth in this circular.

Whereupon the chair appointed the following gentlemen the committee:

A. H. Chappell, Everard Hamilton, J. Cowles, James Goddard, Richard H. Randolph, Engenius A. Nisbet, D. C. Campbell, Elias Beall, L. N. Griffin, Chas. Cotton, George Jewett, Leroy Napier, N. C. Monroe, Ambrose Baker, A. Clopton, Richard K. Hines, E. D. Tracy, Henry G. Lamar, Levi Eckley, Wm. B. Parker and Isaac Stott.

Resolved, That the chairman be added to the committee.

On motion of Henry G. Lamar, esq. it was Resolved, That the editors of papers in this, and all the states interested in the subject, be requested to publish the said circular and resolutions.

Resolved, That the editors of newspapers in this city, are requested to publish the above proceedings.

On motion, the meeting adjourned.

ISAAC C. SEYMOUR, chairman.

WASHINGTON POST, sec'y.

July 17, 1839.

To the cotton planters, merchants, factors, and presidents and directors of the several banks of the southern states.

CIRCULAR.

FELLOW CITIZENS: Interested like yourselves, in the cultivation and disposal of the great staple of American agriculture and commerce, we have accidentally met in this city, in the midst of a crisis which discloses some strikingly momentous features in the history of this most important branch of the trade of our country.

When the cotton crop of the United States was a mere item in its trade, and did not reach a production exceeding five hundred thousand bales it was perhaps safe to consider it as one among many articles of barter and exchange, which left entirely to the fortuitous circumstances of commerce, would find its level under the influence of the ordinary laws of trade, without the necessity of resorting to any means of precautionary protection.

Times, however, have changed. Cotton has passed from the condition of a mere article of commerce, to the performance of the mighty function of being, in a great degree, the regulator of the exchanges, and the standard of value of our country. If the nature of this matter, and its entering into our circulation, it is scarcely less the basis of our currency, than the precious metals; for the fluctuations in its price are felt with a sensibility equally as acute and searching, as any of those variations which belong to the demand and supply of these sensitive and mysterious tokens of national value.

The production of this staple, has now become so immense, that it behoves those who produce it by a large investment of capital at a high rate of incidental cost, and in a climate perilous to human health, to consider, well, whether there are not some material circumstances in reference to the mode in which this product of their labor is shipped from this country, and is brought to market at the point of its final sale and consumption, which demand the application of a prompt and effective remedy. In one word, is not the important fact disclosed, that such is the unwieldy amount of this great staple of southern industry, that it cannot be sent forward and disposed of at large remunerating prices, through the ordinary medium of the mercantile establishments of this country and in Europe, without the direct co-operation of our banking institutions. If we have become satisfied of this fact, ought we not to organize a system, which shall give perfect security to this great interest in the commerce and finances of our country? The unwise and ruinous system of sending the crop forward to houses of circumscribed means, on the other side of the water, who are incapable of holding their consignments an hour beyond the maturity of the bills drawn against such shipments, subjects in fact, nearly the whole amount of American interests to foreign combination, which might act, not only with entire concert, but with a perfect knowledge of the period, when from the maturity of the acceptances in question, property to a stupendous amount belonging to this country, may be ready for sacrifice.

The great and vital change which must be operated, to sustain American interests, by American credit. To realize at home, the resources necessary for the protection of our property abroad, without the necessity of large and inconvenient drafts on the capital and means of our great customer. In other words, the commercial reform we desire, is to send our great staple to market, without the period being determined by the date of a bill of exchange, when it is to be brought forward for absolute and unnecessary sacrifice. We believe that the steadiness in price, which would result from a portion, at least, of the cotton crop being exempt from the disastrous fluctuations arising from compulsory sales, would in the end, be scarcely less valuable to the spinner and consumer in England, than to the grower and shipper here—a fact, which we think demonstrable from the following postulates, which we consider altogether self-evident:

1. The natural price of cotton is the effect of the fair and natural influence of supply and demand.

2. The price cannot be steady, and the article cannot be current, so as to admit of safe calculations on the part of the planter, the manufacturer, and the merchant, unless the price be natural. It is consequently the interest of these three classes, that the article should be protected on the one hand, from any great and undue speculative action, which might inflate prices above the natural rate—and on the other, from any derangement in the money market, or any other accidental cause, which might depress it below that rate. The effect of great and undue speculation being to derange the money market, and to produce re-action, with an undue depression of prices.

3. The state of the currency mainly depends on the means which the country possesses, to pay its foreign debt, by shipment of its produce. To the extent its produce or manufacture falls short of that object, exports of specie may be induced, the effect of which must be a reduction of the circulation, with depreciation of property and general distress.

4. Cotton, in this country, being by far the most paying its foreign debt, it is the interest of the community, and particularly of the moneyed institutions, that the price of it in England (the great market) should be steady, and that the article should be of current sale, so as to be the means of large and effective remittance. It follows, that the interest of the banking institutions here, are the same as those of the three classes first mentioned, namely, that the price should be natural, that it may be steady, and of easy realization.

5. The interest of the British government, of the bank of England, and of the banks of that country in respect to this article, are the same as the interests of the banks here. Their importation there being immense, and the employment of a most numerous body of the laboring classes depending on the steadiness of prices. When they are not steady, the foreign demand for manufactured cotton is reduced greatly, the operatives are thrown out of employment, and the great means of settling the balance of trade with that exportation of precious metals, are withdrawn—manufactured cotton affording by far the most important branch of their export trade.

6. Consequently, any arrangement that could be formed, by which the article would be protected from the effects of undue speculation, and from depression in the money market, and by which steadiness of price, with currency of sale, would be promoted—would save some of the greatest and best interest in both countries.

7. It is therefore proposed to form a system by which, with the commencement of the new crop, advances on cotton shall be made with the capital or credit of banks here, thereby relieving the consignee in Europe from all care or consideration, except the advantageous sale of his stock, which would promote all these interests, and afford general satisfaction on both sides of the water, provided it were done by the means, directly or indirectly, of undue speculation or monopoly.

Having thus indicated the principles on which the proposed system must find its justification and basis, we will now say succinctly as possible, detail the means of carrying it into effect.

We are far from imputing any premeditated hostility of the bank of England to American interests; on the contrary, it is one of the benevolent influences of commercial intercourse to promote peace and good will among nations and men. Hence this great engine of the commercial grandeur and opulence of Great Britain, acting under an enlightened instinct, must rather desire that its best customer should at all times be in a condition to meet her engagements with entire punctuality and success.

But there are epochs in the commerce of England, when, either from insufficient harvests, a languid demand for her manufactures, or political combinations, when the bank may from an urgent policy limit her discounts and increase her rate of interest. This event can never occur, without its having a blighting influence on any surplus of our great staple which might be unsold in England. Surely if the bank of England can exercise unavoidably an influence thus prejudicial, we may resort to our own American banks, as a means of security and protection, without the invidious clamor of combination and monopoly.

It is time that the absurd and senseless cry on the subject of banks making advances on cotton should be understood, and finally put down. The truth is that by the mere purchase of the foreign exchanges of the country, they advance on nearly every bale of cotton subject to foreign export, and this without the security of the bill of lading and policy of insurance, on the mere personal responsibility of the drawers and endorsers of the bill. Hence these losses are most comprehensive and disastrous after every commercial crisis and revulsion.

Now we propose giving to the banks in all cases the higher protection of these securities, and that early next autumn, one or more banks in each of the great commercial cotton markets of the south should commence making advances on the crop, according to scale to be graduated amount, assuming 12-1/2 cents at home to be about the fair natural average and remunerating price of this staple, on a product of sixteen hundred thousand bales, which is about as large a return as the actual labor of the country now engaged in this branch of industry, is capable of harvesting.

The embarrassments of the southwestern states having prevented the planters in these states from making any purchases of slaves from the Atlantic states, during the last two years, whilst not less than ten per cent. of the slave labor of the south has been abstracted in the same period from the cultivation of cotton, and applied to the raising of provisions, and to the construction of those extensive rail roads now in progress throughout that portion of the union.

For these advances we propose that the banks should issue to the planters, merchants and factors of the country, on the production of the bill of lading, and the assignment of the policy of insurance, post notes of such description, and payable at such periods as a convention hereafter contemplated may suggest; notes which may be made to answer both the purposes of currency and exchange, the details of which we refer to that body. By this arrangement, however, we feel satisfied the credits can be so distributed that from the day of the shipment of our cotton it may probably be held at least six months in Europe, without the foreign consignee being under an advance of one farthing, and we think it quite easy to confer on the houses to which the shipments are confided, sufficient strength to enable them to hold over for even a longer period, should safe remunerating prices not be obtained on the maturity of the bills.

With a view of securing this strength, it is indispensably necessary that the consignments should not be too much diffused, but confined to a limited number of houses in Liverpool and Havre, who, acting as the agents of all those who will come into this conservative system, will feel a common interest, and will naturally aid and assist each other under all and every contingency.

This, fellow citizens, is but the brief outline of a great scheme, for the protection of our commerce, finance and exchanges, the details of which must be left for profound deliberation and concerted action. To accomplish this object, we hereby invite the planters, factors and cotton merchants of each district or county in the southern states, and territory of Florida, together with the banks, in each of the said states and territory, to send delegates to meet us in convention at Macon, Georgia, on the fourth Tuesday of October next, which will be on the 22d day of that month, that we may carefully consider the important matters disclosed in this circular.

We invite a candid examination of this whole scheme, for the protection, not alone of southern interests, but for the security of the commerce of the whole country.

Let it at least be tested by patient investigation and enlightened research; if by this plan one-third of the entire cotton crop of the country can be placed beyond the possibility of sacrifice, it will give security to the residue, not by entrenching it behind the guards of a speculative monopoly, but by holding it in that state of security, which the just relations of supply and demand will always in the long run, establish and sustain in the trade of a great and civilized country.

That no time may be lost, we beg leave to apprise you that an agent, having our confidence, will leave this shortly for Europe, clothed with ample instructions, to make such preliminary arrangements with the houses in Liverpool and Havre, which may, by the sanction of the convention have the proposed consummation.

We are aware of the very patent opposition, which a plan, even looking to self defence, must invite both at home and abroad, as it runs counter to a variety of interests, too powerful and too susceptible of combination, not to be aroused into active and perhaps inexorable hostility. If our apology is not to be found in the plea, that we have a right to hold our own property by the means of the credit of our own country, then we fearlessly say, we are at least to attempt it, in despite of any opposition, however, eager and implacable.

We have seen in the face of a crop of 1,350,000 bales an effort made, and very nearly resulting in success, to coerce to the acceptance of the same prices, which were incident to one of 1,800,000 bales. We ought not to rest our security on the adverse omens of the crop, which is now growing under the will and dispensation of Providence, which has already suffered in many quarters from an intense drought, and in others from the ravages of the insects so destructive to its growth and maturity. We should look beyond the era of the short supply of the last year, and an apprehended deficit during the coming season. The lessons of economical wisdom belong to all seasons, and all times, and there is a salutary truth in the homely aphorism that those who do not take care of themselves, are not likely to be taken care of by others. We, therefore, submit this call and invitation to you, with the earnest hope, that you will be prepared to co-operate with us in a measure, in which we believe the highest interests of our common country are involved. We remain, very respectfully, your obedient servants,

THE MANIFESTO OF THE COTTON SPINNERS.

(From the Manchester Guardian, July 3d.)
THE AMERICAN COTTON SPECULATION.
As the Great Western will sail on Saturday next for the United States, we think a few observations upon the origin, present state and probable consequences of the extraordinary speculation in cotton in the United States may not be entirely without interest on either side of the Atlantic; and if they should have any effect in checking the extreme disposition of the American planters and merchants to resort to speculative means of bolstering up the price of their great commodity, to the great injury of the English manufacturers in the first instance, and their loss ultimately, our purpose in writing them will have been fully answered.

As some of the American speculators have recently urged the agreement entered into by certain spinners in this neighborhood to work short time as an excuse for the speculative advances which they propose to make, or rather which they wish to obtain, it is necessary to go back a little to see what was the real origin of the speculation in America, and of the diminished consumption in this country. On referring to our own file for the last year, we will find the following article, which appeared on the 29th December, some time before there had been any agreement to work short time amongst any portion of the spinners in this country:

"The continued action of the banks of the United States on the cotton market, by their extraordinary and unwarranted efforts to bolster up prices by advances to the planters, to enable them to keep their cotton out of the regular markets, has begun to excite a feeling of alarm and irritation in this neighborhood; for, although it is well known that prices must in the end be regulated, as they ought to be at all times, by the natural operations of supply and demand, it is still easy to see that the interference now practising in the southern states of America may very probably have the effect of temporarily forcing up prices here to a very serious extent; and the spinners will be compelled either to stop their works, or to purchase the raw material at rates which they know cannot be permanent, with certain chances of loss from its subsequent decline in value. That the system of advances from the banks, with the view of keeping cotton for a time out of the market, is now carried to a very considerable extent, the recent advices from all parts of the cotton growing states abundantly testify. On Saturday last we inserted a circular issued by Mr. Ingersoll, nominally as agent to Humphreys & Biddle, of Liverpool, but really as agent to the bank of the United States; and we now find in the New York Daily Express of the 7th December, another circular of the same kind, but emanating from a different quarter. It is in the following terms:

"Mississippi Union bank, Jackson, Nov. 16, 1859.
"Sir: The directors of this institution, believing that the cotton crop of this state will fall short, and that planters will postpone the sale of their crops until the deficiency is known, propose to advance 60 dollars for every bale of good cotton, weighing 40 lbs. delivered to the agents of this bank, to be appointed at the following shipping points, viz: at Natchez, Vicksburg, Grand Gulf, Rodney, Manchester, Techna, Saffaria, Marion, Greenwood, Gracada, Columbus, and Mississippi city. The owner to deliver to this bank the said agent's receipt, with the mark, number and weight of each bale, together with a note payable twelve months after date, with two or more good securities, to be submitted to the board for said advance.

The cotton to be shipped to Liverpool or such other market as may be designated by the party delivering the same, at his risk and expense, and sold on account of this bank. The proceeds together with the exchange, both foreign and domestic, to be credited on his note, and the rate of the domestic exchange to be established by the current rate at the time the account of sales is received.—Respectfully,
"W. P. GRAYSON, cashier."

"Now, as the advance mentioned in this circular, sixty dollars a bale, amounts to fifteen cents a pound, which, at the time when the circular was written, exceeded the market prices at New Orleans, and with the freight and charges to which it would be liable, exceeds also the current price in this country at the present moment, it is not easy to conceive what legitimate object the Mississippi Union bank can have in making such advances. But it is alleged in one of the American papers, that another establishment in Mississippi (the Brandon bank, we believe) has offered to advance 70 dollars per bale; or 17 1/2 cents per pound, and this of cotton at that time worth 14 to 14 1/2 per pound in the New Orleans market!"

The circular of Mr. Ingersoll alluded to in the preceding extract, turned out, as our readers may recollect, to have been wholly unauthorised, either by the bank of the United States, or by Humphreys & Biddle; but the circulars of the Mississippi Union bank and the Brandon bank were perfectly genuine; and it became well known in this country, that those and several other establishments of the same kind were advancing largely at most extravagant rates upon cotton consigned to their order; and that, consequently, a very great advance had taken place in prices in all the ports of the United States.

The effect of all these proceedings upon the trade of Manchester and the neighborhood, might have been foreseen by any one who had paid attention to the occurrences of the last 20 or 30 years; for the cotton spinners had too much experience of the results of former speculations, and the issue of former predictions of deficient crops, to place the slightest confidence in the views of the American speculators; and as a body they refused to act in accordance with those views. Notwithstanding the palpable falling off in the receipts of cotton at the American ports, which appeared to corroborate the accounts of short crops, the spinners gave no credit to those accounts; because it was impossible to say how far the supply had been artificially checked, in order to favor the views of the speculators; and, after working out their stocks, they gave with great reluctance the advanced prices which began to prevail on this side of the Atlantic. The buyers of goods and yarns too, who distrusted the results of the speculation quite as much as the spinners, were disposed to clear out their stocks before they ventured upon fresh purchases; and the too rapid extension of manufacturing machinery in the last year or two, having produced an accumulation of manufactures, which could have been taken off only by means of low prices and general prosperity—the effect of these joint causes was greatly to depress the price of manufactures as compared with those of the raw material; and the spinners found, that an advance of some 2 1/2d. per pound in the cotton they were buying at Liverpool did not cause an advance of more than a farthing per pound.

That this unsatisfactory state of things was entirely brought about by the American speculation, we do not mean to assert; the probability is, that without any such speculation the trade of the spinner would not have been very profitable during the present year; but there can be no doubt, that by the speculation the depression was greatly aggravated. The evil, as we have already explained, did not consist in the high price of cotton, so much as in the general distrust of the stability of that price, which was produced by a knowledge of the speculative dealings in the United States. The buyers of goods, without paying any particular attention to the relative prices of raw cotton and manufactured goods, very naturally argued, that, if prices had been raised to a certain level by the speculative advances of the American bankers, they would be likely to fall considerably whenever those advances were withdrawn and the speculation wholly broken down. The disinclination to purchase might have been pretty much the same even if the prices had been lower than they were, provided there had been the same want of confidence in their stability.

How different would have been the situation of all parties concerned, if the cotton crop had been, from the first, fairly upon the market, and the price left to be determined by the natural operations of supply and demand! If the quantity was so deficient as the planters allege (and that there was a considerable deficiency seems now probable enough) the fact would very soon have been manifested by deficient supplies, which, in the absence of speculative combinations, would have been taken as correct indications of the amount of the crop. Prices would, consequently, have risen, without materially checking the consumption; they would, probably, have been decidedly higher at the present moment than they now are, and with tendency upwards, instead of being in a state of steady decline, which, if we may judge from the following facts, is likely to be carried considerably further.

It appears from the Liverpool United Brokers' Circular, that the stock of American cotton in Liverpool, on Friday last was no less than 458,920 bales, which without any further importations, will afford a supply of 17,650 bags per week, for the remaining 26 weeks in the year. But the purchases for consumption of American cotton in Liverpool, during the first 26 weeks of the year, have been only 278,117 bales, or an average of 10,700 bales per week. And if we assume that there were in the hands of dealers and spinners at the commencement of the year, about 80,000 bales more than at the present time, the consumption during the first half of the year, has not amounted to more than 13,000 bags per week. And what are the prospects of consumption for the latter half of the year? Unless there should be a very speedy break down of the speculators giving confidence to dealers in, and consumers of cotton goods, as well as to spinners and manufacturers, the consumption of American cotton for the second half of the year cannot materially exceed that of the first.

At the present time, far from increasing, the consumption is rapidly declining, the present week having witnessed the commencement of short time amongst the spinners at Bolton, (who have entered into an engagement to work not more than four days per week), at Wigan, where ten mills are now standing entirely, and the remainder with one exception working half time on the average, and in different parts of the country, where the consumption is diminishing every week. If, then, the consumption for the second half of the year should not exceed that for the first six months, there will be on the 31st of December next, 100,000 bags remaining out of the present stock in Liverpool, together with the whole of what may be imported from this time to the end of the year, which cannot be estimated at less than 250,000 to 300,000 bales.

With such a stock at the conclusion of the year, and with a coming crop of extraordinary magnitude, we leave our readers to judge what are likely to be the prices of cotton at that time, and what is likely to be the condition of the parties who have engaged in one of the most rash and insane speculations in modern times. That they will be crushed by the weight of their undertaking, is already perfectly clear; and the longer they persist in their present course—the more of temporary aid they will receive from speculative bankers, the more will conceivably be their punishment—and the more extensive will be the consequent derangement of the commerce, the agriculture, and the currency of the United States.

Such are the consequences of excessive speculation—such are the evils inevitably resulting from attempts to monopolize a commodity in extensive use, or to bolster up its price by artificial means. This is far from being the first attempt of the kind that has been made with respect to cotton, which appears to have invited more speculation than almost any other commodity of equal magnitude; and we believe no instance has yet occurred where the speculation has not involved in severe distress and suffering, if not in utter ruin, the great bulk of the parties engaged in it, and unfortunately the evil has not stopped there, but has always extended far and wide amongst those who were perfectly innocent of the error which has given rise to it.

We fear that the planters and merchants of the United States are, as a body, far too prone to engage in undertakings which are entirely inconsistent with the ordinary rules of commercial enterprise; but they will be bad learners indeed if the result of their present speculation does not make some impression upon their minds.

CHRONICLE.

Among the many valuable and important inventions of the day, none are more worthy of our consideration than that of P. P. Dampbell, esp. of New York. I refer to the "fuel saving and spark consuming apparatus," lately tested, and its merits successfully proved upon the Stonington rail road. By this machine the annoyance of sparks to travellers on rail road cars is entirely done away. Not a spark is to be seen, not a particle of smoke. All is consumed in the furnace. Said machine is very simple in its construction, and is intended to retain all the heat. It is affixed to the bottom of the engine below the boiler, and by the aid of a valve, &c., the motion of which is guided by a simple pulley attached to the wheel, the heat is caused to revolve, passing through the tubes of the boiler and machine in reciprocal succession. The saving in fuel is about one quarter.

[N. Y. Jour. Com.]

One steambot has brought to New Orleans, in 202 trips, which she has performed between that city, Bayou Sara and Vicksburg, 113,031 bales of cotton, 3,114 hogsheads sugar, and about 1,500 barrels of molasses and other articles.

Illinois. Fifteen new counties were established at the late session of the legislature of this state, to which the following names were given—Marshall, Brown, Du Page, Menard, Adams, Williamson, Scott, Carter, Cass, Dewitt, Jersey, Lake, Stark and Hardin.

All the officers of state left Vandalia on the 1st inst. for Springfield the new seat of government of this state. The Free Press intimates that there were some "weeping, wailing and gnashing of teeth," when the grand caravan took up its line of march from the old seat of government.

The state bank of Illinois and the pork trade. Some time ago the Chicago Democrat accused the bank of being engaged in a pork trade, and of having upon a lot of $3,000 worth, realized about $40,000. The last Chicago American contains a statement of the cashier of the Chicago branch, in which he states, in the most explicit and unqualified terms, that the whole is a sheer falsehood, and that the bank has not, directly or indirectly, been engaged in any pork transaction.

[St. Louis Republican.]

The debt of Russia is 436,000,000 Prussian dollars. The expenditures of last year were 222,000,000. The revenue $119,000,000. The debt of Prussia is not far from $125,000,000. That of Austria $100,000,000. France $300,000,000, and England more than ten times as much as either.

This explains the saying, regality in debt.

The engineers on the central line of rail road, in Michigan, have all thrown up their employ, owing to the reduction of compensation. The Detroit Advertiser says, very justly, that "scientific engineers cannot be employed at $500 per annum, while an unscientific engineer, by a single mistake, may cost the state thousands."

An account has been kept by the editor of the Harbinger Chronicle of all the late fourth of July accidents, which have passed under his notice in the newspapers up to the 17th inst. from which it appears that no less than forty-one were killed and nineteen wounded and mutilated on that day, by the bungling use of gunpowder and artillery. The editor believes this to be not more than one-fourth of all accidents which have happened on that day. This is a shocking waste of human life, the occurrence of which might be readily prevented by dispensing with the practice of firing artillery salutes on the occasion.

Something new. The Northampton, (Mass.) Courier contains the following notice:

To be born, to be married, and to die, are the three important eras in the history of each individual of the human race. We publish for the information of friends, the marriages and deaths of the people, but not their births. This is customary in the journals in England, among the families of the aristocracy, but in this democratic land it is wholly omitted. We know not why it is so, but next week we purpose to open this department of domestic news, and solicit for insertion notices similar to deaths and marriages.

The bank of Missouri has declared a half yearly dividend of seven per cent.

Revolutionary patriots. The Providence Journal gives the following list of the names, ages, and residences of the twenty-two officers and soldiers of the revolution who joined the army on the 4th of July at that station: Benjamin Pidge, Dighton, 87; Samuel Ingraham, Providence, 90; Joseph Wheaton, Rehoboth, 85; Samuel Tingley, Attleborough, 86; Samuel Lackerforth, Johnston, 83; Nelson Miller, Bristol, 84; Grinnel Chace, Barrington, 82; Martin Mason, Providence, 84; Aaron Turner, Warren, 81; William Harding, Providence, 84; William Wilkinson, do. 79; Elisha Arnold, Cranston, 79; William Arnold, Warwick, 77; Levi Reed, Attleborough, 76; Charles Cushing, Seekonk, 76; John Arnold, Pawtucket, 76; Nathaniel B. Leonard, Providence, 76; Benjamin Eddy, do. 74; Thomas Webster, do. 73; Elias D. Trafton, do. 73; Elisha Dillingham, do. 72; Benjamin Peck, do. 60.

General Hamilton. The New York Express gives the following as a recollection of Gen. Hamilton: "On the 14th July general Hamilton expired at the country seat of William Bayard, now the spot of Bank street, on the North river. He fell in the duel the day previous with colonel Burr. The city was thrown into great consternation. All classes, and both political parties united in paying his memory proper respect. The merchants, the members of the bar, the mechanics, all held meetings and adopted suitable resolutions. The stores were closed—all business at a stand. The ships in port, including the French and British frigates, hoisted their colors half mast. The procession to the grave was comprised of all classes, in regular order. He was buried in Trinity church yard. His monument, with his simple name and age, may be seen on the side adjoining Rector street. A large and beautiful willow which shaded his ashes was recently blown down by the storm. The correspondence and whole proceedings of the causes and consequences, are given in the journals of the day, and occupy four columns. Governor Morris delivered the funeral oration in Trinity church. The grand jury found a bill of wilful murder against Aaron Burr."

Major Jack Berry, an old and distinguished chief of the Seneca Indians, died at Buffalo creek reservation on the 31st. He acted a conspicuous part during the war of the revolution, and fought under general Scott and Porter, at the battles of Chippewa, Bridge-water and Erie. He understood our language, and frequently acted as interpreter. One of the last acts of his life was to sign the treaty lately negotiated by our government with the New York Indians; and he enjoyed upon his tribe the benefits which would accrue to them by removing to the new home provided for them in the west.

The annual commencement at Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa. was held on the 11th inst. before a large concourse of citizens from various sections of the country. Within a few years, Dickinson college has undergone a thorough re-organization. It is now under the supervision of professor J. P. DURBIN, president of the college, and a faculty composed of gentlemen distinguished for their learning and piety.

The number of students in the college this year is embraced in the following summary.

Table with 2 columns: Student type and number. Categories include Law students (19), Under graduates (seniors, juniors, sophomores, freshmen) (94), Pursuing a partial course (8), In college (121), Pupils in the grammar school (102), Total (223).

Honor to the brave dead. Major Benjamin Romaine, of this city, one of our oldest citizens, has become, by auction purchase, proprietor of the museum at the Walnut, which contains the remains of eleven thousand American victims to the horrors of the Jersey prison ship. These remains were interred many years since, and the grounds long neglected are now to be appropriately ornamented.

Flour and Wheat. The quantity of flour and wheat delivered from the Erie canal, at the places named below, during the second week in July, is as follows:

Mortality among fish. Great numbers of dead fish may be found on the shores of the creeks which empty into Chester river, which so taint the air, that it is highly offensive to approach them. Flocks of buzzards and other carnivorous birds, together with the swine, are banqueting upon them.

The cause of this great mortality among the fish is, we believe, the result of swarms of American water bugs, who reside near these waters. Some have supposed that they die upon the flats and other shoal places where the water is overheated by the sun, others have attributed their destruction to the immense quantity of grass which every where abounds in those creeks. It is worthy of remark that prior to 1823, the year of the cholera, there were very few, if any, dead fish to be seen; since then they have been numerous. Whether the cholera had any influence upon the fish or the water, and whether its effects still remain, are questions for the curious.

A convention of editors is now sitting at Columbus, Ohio, for the arrangement of matters connected with the improvement of the character of the press, and the condition of those identified with it.

The following lines, so curiously prophetic, were written on the window glass of an inn in England in 1774. They are by Gaius Verplanch, an uncle of the present distinguished gentleman of that name, who was at the time upon his travels in Europe:
"Hail happy Britain, freedom's best retreat;
Great is thy power, thy wealth, thy glory great;
But wealth and power have no immortal day,
For all things ripen only to decay.
And when that time arrives, the lot of all,
When Britain's glory, power and wealth shall fall;
Then shall thy sons by fire's unchang'd decree,
In other worlds another Britain see.
And what thou art, America shall be."
[Knickerbocker.]

Postage. In answer to an inquiry from the editor of the Army and Navy Chronicle, the postmaster general says, that postmasters are "justified in giving the usual notices to the publishers, when requested to do so by subscribers, of any intended change in their station or residence;" but, to avoid subsequent misunderstanding between the parties, such request should always be made in writing."

The pirate Knudsden pardoned. Hans Knudsden, who had been found guilty with Williams, since executed at New York, of piracy, in the Branganza case, but recommended to mercy by the jury, has been pardoned by the president, and was on Friday morning set at liberty.

Fool-hardness. A few days ago, Messrs. Lewis and Heberton, of Philadelphia, accompanied by Messrs. Wynn and Kenbell, after having ventured under the great falls of Niagara, to the extremity of the terminus rock, attempted to walk the rapids above the falls. Mr. Heberton took the lead, but had not proceeded far when his foot slipped, and the force of the water was fast carrying him toward the cataraet, when he was caught and saved from a dreadful death by Mr. Lewis, sustaining little injury beyond the fright and a few bruises on the hands by clatching at the rocks.

Steam navigation. A late London paper cites a passage of the steam ship City of Hamburg, between London and Newcastle, a distance of 360 miles, in only 21 hours, as a sample of rapid communication. This is at the rate of 11 2/3 miles an hour. The Boston Advertiser adds: The late passage of the steambot Albany, from New York to Albany, probably made with the aid of a favorable tide, was equal to 17 1/2 miles an hour, running time 15 miles an hour, including stops.

An incident is related in the New Orleans Bee, which is without a parallel in the annals of travel. A gentleman who left New Orleans in the steambot Diana, reached Louisville in five days eighteen and a half hours; remained at Louisville thirty hours, and returned to New Orleans in the steambot Comte in four days and a half—having thus traversed a distance of about three thousand miles in about eleven days and a half.

Church built of mulberry trees. The Watersfield girls once built a church out of the proceeds of an onion crop. The Northampton Courier tells a story to match. Some dozen individuals in Amherst, entered into the mulberry business some six or seven years since, with a determination, if successful, to erect a new meeting house in that parish. They have been successful, and out of the profits of this little joint stock company a church is now erecting in the east parish, in Amherst.

A military state convention was recently held in Maine. About 50 delegates were present.

According to a statement recently made in parliament, the whole number of persons engaged in the various wool, cotton, flax and silk factories throughout the united kingdom, is 355,333, viz: males 153,535—females 196,818.

Antiquities. The lords of the admiralty have sent a ship of war to the southeastern part of Asia Minor, for the purpose of transporting from thence to this country a large collection of most valuable ancient sculptures and bas-reliefs, which have been discovered by Mr. Fellows, in Asia Minor, where many towns and cities, and a remarkable and nearly perfect theatre, hitherto quite unknown, have likewise been found. Mr. Haffkins, one of the curators of the British museum, has been principally instrumental in securing to that establishment these invaluable remains of Grecian art, many of which are said to be in a state of comparative perfection. [London paper.]

Mr. Timothy Conklin, a soldier of the revolution, died suddenly of apoplexy, while participating in the celebration of the fourth of July at Milan, Ohio. He was at the age of 96, and had walked a distance of three miles the same morning.

Spots on the sun's disc. It is stated in the Franklin, (Ohio), Republican, that there are three clusters of spots now traversing the left side of the sun, two of which are particularly large. The whole may be seen with any kind of pocket telescope or glass, except that of having stolen from said vessel a box containing $3000 in gold. He made several purchases for which he invariably paid in doubloons, and this fact, with a knowledge of the robbery and the description of his person, led to his arrest, information of which has been forwarded to New York.

Arrest. A man named Henry Bright, formerly mate of the Duchess D'Orleans, was arrested at the clothing store of Mr. Mooney, in Pratt street, Baltimore, on the 20th inst. at the residence of Mr. Mooney, on suspicion of having stolen from said vessel a box containing $3000 in gold. He made several purchases for which he invariably paid in doubloons, and this fact, with a knowledge of the robbery and the description of his person, led to his arrest, information of which has been forwarded to New York.

Specie. The Cincinnati Republican of the 15th inst. says that $200,000 in silver were forwarded from that city to the east, on this day.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

☞The long expected steam ship, The British Queen, arrived at New York on Sunday morning last in fifteen days and a half from Portsmouth, from which she sailed on the 12th, bringing London dates to the 11th ult. We have published all the news of interest brought by her, which is more unfavorable to the cotton holders than the advices brought by the Great Western. Cotton had declined nearly one penny, and there was a prospect of a further declension in the price in consequence of a renewal of the combination of the cotton spinners to "work short." It is also intimated that the bank of England will still further raise the rate of interest, and thus increase the embarrassment of the cotton market. The political news is not of much interest, and, with the exception of the war in Syria, all is quiet.

The news brought by the Queen had not much effect upon the money market, for the public mind was prepared for gloomy tidings—but some anxiety was felt about the price of bills which might be wanted for remittance by that ship and the Great Western, which were announced to sail on Thursday last. The quantity wanted was not large, and was mainly supplied by the Bank of the United States at 110, though some bills were sold as low as 109½. About a million of dollars has been shipped for England and France in the course of the week. At the last advices from N. York the money market was, in some degree, more easy, and it was supposed that the banks would relax their policy and "do" fair business paper to a moderate amount.

The Great Western and British Queen both sailed from New York on Thursday last. The former at about 1 o'clock P. M. and the latter at about 2 o'clock P. M. The Great Western carries out 65 passengers, and the British Queen 120. Accompanied by the latter vessel are Mr. C. C. Cambreleng, Mrs. Papineau and family, Madame Augusta, &c. while the lions of the Great Western are Mr. Vincent Noite and general Hamilton.

It is stated that the ships are determined to have a trial of speed, and that heavy bets have been made upon the result of the race. One half of the population of New York and Brooklyn lined the shores and wharves; to witness their departure; and the scene was not a little heightened by the sailing of several packet ships.

THE BRITISH QUEEN. This noble vessel caused quite a sensation in New York, and tens of thousands crowded to see her. But few persons had an opportunity of seeing her machinery and accommodations for passengers, &c. which are said to be of the very best description, in consequence of her short stay in port. As an evidence that her engines were not stopped for one minute, from the time she left England until she arrived at the pier in New York, where she took her station along side of the Great Western and caused that favorite ship to dwindle into a mere pigmy in comparison. Our readers may form an idea of the immense proportions of the former, from the fact, that she is thirty feet longer than the ship of war Pennsylvania.

The Liverpool Mercury informs us that the great steamer, called the President, will be at that port about the first of September to receive her machinery. She is larger, will have greater power, and is generally considered a much finer vessel than the British Queen. She is intended to run between Liverpool and New York. It is also stated in a letter from London, in the New York Commercial, that the Great Western steam ship company are preparing to build an iron steamer, to run in connection with their present ship. She is to be named the "New York" and will have engines of one thousand horse power.

The New York Express, second edition, dated Monday, 2 P. M. says:—

The commercial news by the British Queen bad as it is for the United States, has produced no further unfavorable effects upon our money market. Indeed, this news was anticipated, and the public mind was so stunned by the report brought by the Great Western, that it is, as it were, insensible now. The public anxiety, is, if any thing, relieved, and therefore, the feeling in the market is perhaps, a little better.

It is not expected that the losses on cotton will fall heavily upon many New York houses—for those houses here, which have advanced on cotton are but agents of holders at the south,—and the differences between their advances and the actual price it will command is not believed to be very great. The blow it is thought, will fall with the greatest severity upon the south and south west, while the north will be unscathed.

We hear of the exportation of manufactured goods from Liverpool to a considerable amount, intended for a market here, and for a sale on British account. The necessities of the manufactures probably compel this sacrifice, for sacrifice it must be now, if such goods to any amount are sent, but the pressure upon the foreign money market probably compels the sale without regard to the loss.

There is no panic in New York, as we see stated in some quarters. The attempt made by the incendiary publications of one political print, and a hand-bill in the streets, to run the banks for specie, had no effect, inasmuch as the readers and abettors of such publications have no means of carrying their designs into effect. There are no failures attracting public attention, and we hear of none at all. The money market is tight, and the banks discount but little, but there is, fortunately, no great demand for money. What specie may be necessary for the regulation of the foreign exchange will quietly go out, but there is no alarm about it, and but little anxiety, particularly as long as the U. S. bank holds the rate on London firm at 110.

CASE OF GEN. GRATIOT. From the St. Louis Republican of July 19. We publish below a card from col. Joseph G. Laveille, the foreman of the jury in the case of the United States vs. gen. Gratiot before the United States circuit court. In addition to the statement of col. Laveille, we can say, that in a free and unreserved conversation with two or three other jurors, on the same day they were discharged by the court, we heard from them the same statement here made by col. L. Any statement that col. Laveille may make needs no corroborating testimony here, or in any community in which he is known. There is no man in this community whose assertions will receive more credence than his.

My attention having been called to an article in the Washington Globe of the 27th of May last, headed "juries and defaulters," I do unhesitatingly declare, in my capacity of foreman of the jury in the case of United States vs. gen. C. Gratiot, heard before judge Catron, in the court house in this city in April last, that the statements made in reference to said cause are at utter variance with the truth. The writer says: "The verdict would have been in accordance with the charge of the court, but for the opposition of a single juror."

Now I state confidently, that eight jurors were agreed to give a verdict for gen. Gratiot. Of two others I can only speak doubtfully, but I can aver with confidence, that up to the period of our discharge only two of the jurors were prepared to give a verdict for the United States for the amount claimed.

It was recommended to the jury to agree to the following: "In obedience to the instruction of the court, we find for the United States;" this was drawn up and sealed, but not carried into court, and the jury remained in charge of the marshal until dismissed at the rising of the court, without any change in their opinions.

JOSEPH C. LAVILLE.
St. Louis, July 1, 1839.

CONSUL. The president of the United States has officially recognized senr Don Juan Bautista Purroy as consul of the republic of Venezuela for the city of New York.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. H. L. Holmes, of North Carolina, to be attorney of the United States for the district of North Carolina, in the place of Thomas P. Devereaux, resigned.

Thomas Turner, of Georgetown, to be justice of the peace in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE. Information has been officially received of the establishment of two new light houses on the French coast of the Manche or British channel, viz:

One at cape carteret, in the latitude of 49 degrees 22 minutes and 27 seconds north, and 4 degrees 8 minutes and 40 seconds longitude west from Paris. The light is a repeating light, at intervals of half a minute each, situated on a tower about 240 feet above the level of the sea, and 43 feet from the ground. It may be seen in fine weather at the distance of 13 miles; the eclipses will however be total only beyond 7 miles.

The other, on the central fort of the dyke at Cherbourg, in the latitude of 49 degrees 40 minutes and 28 seconds, and 3 degrees 57 minutes and 23 seconds longitude, west from Paris; the light is a small light, varied by bright flashes every three minutes, situated on a tower newly erected on the central fort, about 65 feet above the water at high tide. It may be seen at the distance of about nine miles in ordinary weather.

BANKS IN SOUTH AMERICA. A citizen of the United States has obtained a charter from the republic of Ecuador, for a bank, the principal branch of which is to be established at Guayaquil. The chief provisions of the charter are these:

The bank is to be one of discount and deposit. The capital, five hundred thousand dollars, to be paid in coin of the republic, and to remain constantly in the bank.

The bank may issue bills, payable in specie at sight, to twice the amount of the capital. No bill to be issued for less than ten dollars, under penalty of forfeiting the charter. These bills shall not be held as legal tender in payment of debts. The government may receive them in payment of duties, but will not compel its creditors to receive them.

The bank shall lend to no individual at one time, more than ten thousand dollars. It shall hold no property, other than the banking house.

It shall not be concerned, directly or indirectly, in any commercial transactions, other than the purchase of bills of exchange, foreign and domestic, under penalty of forfeiting its charter.

The bank may demand nine per cent. interest upon its loans, and not more. No officer or director of the bank shall borrow from it more than five thousand dollars at any one time.

The charter shall continue for ten years, revocable at the pleasure of the government.

The bank shall receive in deposit all funds of the government. The bank shall receive in deposit all funds of the government, and pay them out, free of charge.

THE OTTOMAN PORTE. The Turkish vocabulary would be a very convenient thing for the reader of newspapers, and particularly at the present time, when Turkish affairs are brought into special notice. Many are confused by the various terms which they find in the papers; they read of the Ottoman porte—the sutlime port—the divan, &c. without gaining any very distinct ideas, and they either omit the oriental news as unintelligible, or content themselves with a very superficial acquaintance with it. Some of our readers may perhaps be gratified with an explanation of several of the terms in question although others will need no such information. We therefore turn hastily to several works of reference, and give the following:

Sultan is the title of the Turkish despot. It is a word of Arabic origin signifying mightily. The power of the sultan is hereditary, and knows no limit except the precepts of the Koran, and no restraint except the fear of assassination. The whole administration, civil, military and religious is at his disposal. Grand seignor is another title by which he is known. The title padishah also belongs to him, and is regarded in Turkey as highly honorable.—The present sultan is Mahmood II.

Ottoman, the appellation given to the Turkish empire, is derived from the name of its founder.—Othman, Ottoman or Osman.

Ottoman porte, or sublime porte, is the name of the Turkish government. The word porte, (Latin porta, a gate) was applied because this was the name given to the gate of the sultan's palace.

Divan, the name of the supreme council of state. Its original signification is—a board, or low level. Its use therefore corresponds nearly with our use of board for council.

Grand vizier, the prime minister of state. On him devolves the actual authority. He appoints to all civil and military officers, and puts to death whom he pleases. The word vizier probably comes from the Latin viduo, to see.

Muffi. This is the title of the supreme judicial officer, and interpreter of the Koran. His office cannot be compared with any in the governments of western Europe. His rank is next to that of the grand vizier, if not superior.

Reis effendi, the secretary of state. The word effendi is of modern introduction, and is a corruption of a Greek word signifying lord or master. It is often used as a term of respect.

Pashaw, or bashaw, or pacha, the first being the most correct. This is the governor of a Turkish province. He is appointed by the sultan or vizier, and exercises great power. "The most distinguished have three horse-tails carried before them; the inferior only two." The capudan (captain) pashaw is the high admiral.

Mussulman or moolan signifies, in the Turkish language, a true believer. [North American.]

VENEZUELA, NEW GRENADA AND ECUADOR.—Extract from the message of Dr. Marquez, president of New Grenada, to the present congress of that state. The divisions of the debt of Colombia among the three states into which it is now separated, is important to the interests of American citizens having claims upon Colombia:

"The congress of plenipotentiaries, from the three states of Venezuela, New Grenada and Ecuador, into which the former republic of Colombia has been divided, has remained in session at Bogota since the 25th April, 1838. Order, and great zeal to promote the interests of these states, have marked the labors of the commission. The subjects of finances and of the state debt, which exclusively engage the attention of the plenipotentiaries, will doubtless be satisfactorily adjusted; nor will those difficult and complicated questions be suffered to disturb the good intelligence which now subsists between the three republics."

The report of the secretary of the treasury for the republic of New Grenada presents the following statement of receipts and expenditures:

Receipts of the present year	$2,449,284
" 1838	2,192,572
Increase	$256,712

Expenditures for 1839	$2,373,129
Receipts	2,449,284

Excess of receipts -	$76,155
Remitted to London, to pay the interest on national debt -	$14,000

The public debt of Colombia, at the period of the triple divisions, amounted to about $50,000,000 by estimation.

According to the project of treaty adopted by the plenipotentiaries, this debt consisted of consolidated three and five per cent. loans and of floating debts. The amount of the latter cannot yet be ascertained.

Of the three per cent. consolidated debt, there are $6,998,212; of debt bearing five per cent. interest, there are $5,374,905.

In the distribution of this debt of Colombia among the three states, it is agreed that Venezuela shall assume twenty-eight and a half parts in a hundred, New Grenada fifty parts, and Ecuador twenty-one and a half parts. [Globe.]

NATIONAL DEBTS. It will be seen by the following table, copied from a recent speech in the English house of commons, that Sweden, Switzerland and the United States, are the only nations which are free from a national debt:

J. Q. ADAMS' TOAST. Delivered at Canton on the 4th of July:

The grand climacteric of our country.—May her old age never fail to fulfil the promises of her youth.

The president of the day then announced the following toast:

"The sage and patriot, John Quincy Adams.
"Who born for the country ne'er narrowed his mind,
"Nor to party gave up what was meant for mankind!"

JUDGE WHITE, of TENN. At the celebration of the 4th of July, in Knoxville, Judge White, who was present, was toasted, for his "firm, constant and unwavering support of republican principles."—The Knoxville Times says:

"After the renewed cheers with which this sentiment was received by the company, had subsided, Judge White rose and remarked that, 'So unexpected were these expressions of opinion and feeling, so totally unappreciated by me, to give sufficient utterance to the warm emotions which they had excited in his breast, that he had never risen under more real embarrassment than at this time.'

"After an eloquent reference to his inheritance of unalloyed whig blood from some of the purest patriots of the revolution, and the manly rebuke of the charge of federalism alluded to in the toast, he remarked that as he 'wished not to say any thing on that day, which might be adverse to the political feelings of any one, he would there conclude.'" He was here interrupted by urgent and reiterated cries of 'go on! go on!' when, after some hesitation, he proceeded with a most lucid and masterly exhibition of his own position—the consistency of his present opinions, with those of his former life; followed by an exposure of facts, in relation to the reckless and extravagant system of government expenditures, particularly as relates to Indian affairs, the chairman of the committee upon which subject, in the United States senate, he has been for many years.

"Judge White concluded with the following toast—

"By the hon. Hugh L. White—The Tennessee Whigs—May they ever resist the exercise of unconstitutional and oppressive power, come from what quarter it may, from open enemies or false friends. In doing so, 'they follow in the footsteps' of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, and the other whigs of 1776."

AN IMPORTANT FACT IN MR. CLAY'S HISTORY. The Charlottesville Advocate, in an article on Mr. Clay's public life, says, "it is not a little remarkable, however, in the midst of all this neglect, how invariably his master spirit has been looked to, both by friends and foes, whenever any great and imminent danger has impended over the country. At the commencement of the last war, he was the person selected by president Madison to be commander-in-chief of the army, and he was not nominated only because the government could not get on without his assistance in congress, where his powerful mind and great popularity enabled him to render services, the value of which it would not be easy now to estimate—consuming all at Ghent, were, with the aid of the other commissioners, he succeeded in giving to this second war of independence an honorable and, for us, happy and fortunate termination."

THE EAST AND THE WEST. The Hon. John Reed, a member of congress from Massachusetts, was at Maumee city, Indiana, on the 4th ultimo, and joined in the celebration of the day. The Express says that, on being called upon for a sentiment, he rose and addressed the company to the following effect:

"I rise, Mr. President, to offer an apology, and, in so doing, I am impelled to state the feelings that have prompted me to offer the few remarks with which I shall trouble you. I am among you, gentlemen, a stranger yesterday evening, and, but for an unexpected interposition of Providence, should have left you this morning. I have to thank your hospitality for the kindness with which you have treated an entire stranger, whose only claim upon you was that he was thrown among you on a day of national rejoicing, when the bonds of love to our kind are drawn stronger by the recollection of the signal benefits that have arisen from the union of men, all acting in a good cause, and influenced by the same motive. My thanks, flowing from a full heart, you have, for the generous consideration which has enabled me to participate in the celebration of a day dear to us all, and especially for that cordiality that has taken away all feelings of strangeness from my bosom, and identified me with you in social, as strongly as in political life, as a part of the great west, in my national feeling."

"For a number of years, it has been my lot to represent the district in which I reside in congress, and it is with feelings of just pride that I state that, during the time, no single member has given more votes for the furtherance of western improvements. I have watched the growth and improvement of the west for many years; and, although this is my first visit to your land, my spirit has wandered here much and often, while I have examined your maps—traced your great rivers—followed the meanderings of your mighty lakes—traced the course of your canals and rail roads—and fixed in my mind the points where future cities are to arise, rich in the tread of a people rendered wealthy by the cultivation of a soil whose fertility can find no parallel to itself, and besides their own, a rich, an I feel, in turning my eyes to the west, am I looking in this direction with an intensity which is the offspring of their feelings of national pride as well as of their interest. Thousands of the enterprising of every sort are looking upon the luxuriant plains and rich valleys of the great west as the places for the future homes of themselves and their children; while thousands more look upon this same country as the land from which their bread must flow, and which will receive from the east in return its supplies of those innumerable manufactures which have rendered that country emphatically the workshop of America, and in many respects of the whole world.

"And this gentleman, leads me to the subject which called me up to express my feelings. One of the regular toasts of this day speaks of the great system of canals, of which the Wabash and Erie forms the eastern branch as the chain that binds the fortunes of this place with those of the great states of Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky. There is a bolder and a broader view to be taken of these great improvements, and one that seems to me more consonant with the spirit of the day we met to celebrate. I speak of the great works as they appear in a national point of view. We at the east look on them, not so much as the means of building up one particular town, as the great chains that are to bind together the feelings and the interests of sections the most remote from each other. We in Massachusetts are viewing with feelings of intense interest the progress of the great public country as being to us what Egypt was to Rome—its granary; and we cannot but be impatient to contribute to the means which are provided for the bringing of your productions to our market, and for returning our productions to yours. Permit me, then, to offer as a sentiment—

"The Wabash and Erie and Miami canals—The chains that bind together the interests of the east and the west, the north and the south."

NAVAL. The U. S. steamer Poinsett arrived at St. Augustine on the 17th instant, and was to leave there at the end of the week for Key Biscayne and the islands of South Florida, in which quarter she is intended to cruise. The Herald says of her—"The Poinsett, painted black, with her white painted ports, looks about the guards as gray as a sloop of war, and above has as much top hamper as a load of hay. She draws six feet water, and though schooner rigged, she runs a chance of getting "snagged" on the reefs; if a pretty considerable supply of wood is not in readiness. What with a small vessel, red hot boilers, a varial sun, smoke, cinders and mangrove-key mosquitoes, the officers and crew may anticipate delightful cruising."

The U. S. schooner Experiment, attached to the survey of southern harbors, six days from Sapelo Inlet, (Geo.) arrived at Norfolk on the 25th ult. all well.

Lieut. James Glynn, commanding, passed midshipmen James Anderson, William Ronckenorff, passed assistant surgeon G. M. Delaney.

STEAM FRIGATES. As in the American, so in the British navy, the general impression is, that the existing steam frigates are total failure. We best not how it is France. It is certain that the best modes of applying the tremendous power of steam to ships of war are yet to be discovered. But they will be discovered, and steam will be the prime minister in the settlement of all warlike affairs. If America be true to herself, she will win the honour of the discovery. France will probably get it, if this country cannot. France may now be to be built at short notice. She looks farther ahead than England, much less ourselves. She has an eye to the future in all her movements, and we doubt not that the best surveys of our harbors extant are in her possession. Wherever a French national vessel goes, she comes not away empty handed on the score of knowledge. While the brig Oreste that sailed on Friday, lay between the forts, we observed, a few evenings since, not far from sun down, a swift cutter leave the brig, make directly for the fort, and after a short delay, move over to the naval hospital, taking a course that would enable an engineer to sound the two shores with the greatest accuracy. The boat then went down towards Craney island, and we lost sight of her in that direction. The result of her jaunt was no doubt a regular survey of the harbor and channel. Might not our national ships act upon this hint, and supply the navy department with accurate charts of all the harbors which they may visit in their cruises, and which might be published from time to time for the benefit of commerce? BURNING MINE. One of the coal mines near Pottsville, Pa. was accidentally set on fire last winter, and although various efforts have been made to extinguish it, it still burns as fiercely as ever. The editor of the Miners' Journal, who recently paid a visit to it, thus describes the scene:

"Leaving the cars we walked up the ravine, to the lower levels of the workings; here, although not surrounded by a flood of lava, we found the waters issuing from the driftway to be quite warm from the effects of the infernal fire, and impregnated so strongly with alkaline substances as to be extremely nauseous to the taste.

We now prepared to ascend the west brow of the broad mountain. Beating above us for some hundred feet, and belching forth smoke and flame, arose the track of the vein, which we ascended on the crop. A little puffing and blowing brought us to the second level, where the disaster commenced during the extreme cold weather of last winter. A hanging grate placed at its mouth to equalize the temperature communicated fire to the couplings of the gangway, and was the primary cause of the vast damage which has since accrued. Some hundred feet farther up the hill, a large space had caved in, and down the fissures between the upper and lower rocks, could be seen a yawning fiery gulph, where Vulcan and his Cyclops might revel in, and salamanders only exist. A sulphurous exhalation issued from it, which rendered approximation not quite so grateful as lavender water, or as cool as iced punch. About the jaws of this vast cave, were deposits of sulphur, and some alkaline substances in great quantities. Large rents and fissures in the ground showed the extent of the raging infernal heat, and many places appeared ready to fall in, and precipitate the incautious spectator into the chasin. Down the old air shafts, the currents of air rushed with a rumbling earthquake sound, to feed with their oxygen the volcano beneath. Now and then a crumbling mass of slate, or a detached portion of rock, would leave the bed, where it had been recumbent since the world began, and with resistless force, plunge headlong into the smoky crater.

The vegetation on the summit and sides of the hill, showed the scathing effects of this unnatural heat: the tall pine drooped its giant arms, the hemlock bowed its head, as if parched by arid sufferings, the young oak and chestnut were clad in a premature "scur and yellow leaf," and here and there the mountain vines seem to cling more closely to their parent trees, as if like the children of Laocoon, they sought aid from the fiery breath, and

"... hissing jaws that sputter'd flame."

A dreary spot, is now, that once lovely mountain gap! the elemental war has prostrated all its beauty of foliage, the voice of industry is hushed, the rustic cascade seems to leap less merrily than it was wont, and the once buoyant air is heavy and oppressive with the murky vapours that lower over the fair face of nature!

When, or in what manner the ravages will be stopped is a matter of uncertainty, and equally so, is it, whether human ingenuity can restrain them. In the mean time the loss of time and material falls heavy on Mr. L. C. Dougherty, the lessee, who has used every possible means within his power, to check the destruction. Attempts have been made to smother the flame, but it always breaks out in some new place with increased fury, and baffles its opponents.

OUR COAL SHIPMENTS. We last week gave an estimate of the comparative amount of coal shipped from our region up to July 20th, of last year and the present. Those who are unacquainted with the statistics of our region, may be misled as to the quantity which will probably be shipped, as our article may readily create an erroneous impression. The amount of coal sent to market to July 20, of the three last years, is as follows:

	Schenckkill region.	Lehigh region.
1837	207,789	101,195
1839	192,657	97,536

Now it will be seen, that although the shipments of 1839 exceed those of 1838 by 35,537 tons, yet they fall short 15,132 of those of the preceding year, 1837. In 1837 during this month, our weekly shipments averaged 17,280 tons, while this year they do not come up to 14,000, and are decreasing.

There remains of the navigation season about 17 weeks, in which 290,000 tons may be shipped, which added to the amount already sent to July 20, viz: 192,657 tons, will give 482,657 tons, as the total shipments from this region.

The total shipments in 1837 were	523,152
do. do. 1838 were	431,719
The supposed do. 1839 will be	482,652

In 1838 general commercial stagnation checked the increase of the trade, but its previous average annual increase had been over 100,000 tons. It appears, however, above, that we shall fall short of the shipments of 1837 about 40,495 tons.

We are led to these remarks, in order to give a fair statement of the trade as it is, and to show the consumer the necessity of laying in his winter supply of coal, without listening to exaggerated rumors of an over-tock. In the present depressed state of the money market, dealers cannot obtain facilities for buying coal, and the consequence has been a very reduced shipment in comparison with 1837, while to meet the naturally increased consumption, instead of 482,657, our region should send her 600,000 tons.

The Lehigh coal region is placed in precisely the same situation. From their outlets there were sent the following amounts:

To July 20, 1837	101,195

It will here again be seen that the amount of 1837 exceeds that of 1839, and in the former year they sent 8,700 tons more, and in the market year they dates they are sending 9,317 tons more, which difference cannot materially assist in making up any deficiency an increased consumption may require. All accounts agree in computing 825,000 tons as the amount from all sources for this year's demand, and it is therefore evident that every facility must be extended, and every outlet be unimpeded by accident to allow it to be met. FORT PREBLE. Uncle Sam having made ample provision for repairing the fort in our harbour, the work has commenced in good earnest. We visited the fort on Saturday afternoon and found everything in admirable confusion. The workmen were leveling the old ramparts to the ground with the design of increasing the thickness of the wall and building nearly all anew. The gate and arch leading to the enclosure has been torn down and a new iron gate and granite posts will be erected instead. The brick wall will be supplied mainly by mounds of earth, believed to be a much safer security. The buildings are also receiving necessary repairs. The powder magazines, sleeping rooms and all of the soldiers' quarters are to be remodeled and made safe and comfortable. We understand that a company of U. S. troops will be stationed at the fort as soon as the work is completed.

It has been suggested to us that as a fortification the location of Fort Preble is much less favorable for the defence of the harbour than many other points in the vicinity—than Hog Island Ledge for example, where there is a good and accessible foundation for building a fortification. A suitable fort could be erected there which would command both entrances to the harbor. Fort Preble commands but one, and the fort is overlooked by the highland of House Island. It would be well, therefore, for the proper officers of the government to reconnoitre a little before making heavy expenditures on the fort. [Portland Advertiser.

DEATH OF TECUMSEH. Shaw-ben-eh, a Potawatonic Chief, who was at the battle of Thames, lately gave at the United States hotel in this city, through an interpreter, a full account of the death of Tecumseh. Tecumseh was a very brave, but cautious man. He had, however, been wounded in the neck and became desperate. He thought his wound was mortal, and told his warriors that, as he must die, there could be no risk in rushing forward to kill col. Johnson. He did so, and Shaw-ben-eh saw him when he fell. His object was to strike the colonel with his tomahawk before he saw him, and a moment more of inattention and the colonel's head would have been sundered. He was shot just as his arm had reached the full height to strike the fatal blow. He described the colonel's horse very minutely. He was very large and white, with occasional black spots. Another Indian in company, whom Shaw-ben-eh said was but a boy at the time of the battle, interrupted him to say that his mane and tail were black. The next day he with many others, and this boy, went upon the field of battle and saw Tecumseh's body there, and by the side of it another Indian whose skin had been taken off. He said he had heard of this skin's having been exhibited as that of Tecumseh, they might think so. But it was not. Tecumsh's body had not been touched. Here some one asked where and how they buried him. This aroused the chief from his seat, and he was eloquent in the extreme. None but brave warriors die on the battle field. Such, afraid of nothing when alive, don't care for dogs, wolves, eagles and crows when dead. They want the prairie—the cross of a broad prairie to lie upon. So Tecumseh, the bravest man that ever was, whom the great spirit would not let be killed by the common soldier, but sent to col. Johnson to be killed, wanted no grave nor honors. He let every animal come and eat his flesh, as he made every red man love and every white man fear him. Shaw-ben-eh expatiated long upon his merits, and believed, if he had killed col. Johnson and lived to this day, the Pottawatomies would not have been away out on the Missouri river, as they now are.

THE LATE FATAL ACCIDENT ON THE RAIL ROAD.—It will be recollected that we stated a few days ago that at the coroner's inquest held over the body of the unfortunate woman who died in the Alms house of Washington city, in consequence of the injury which she received from the bumper of the engine on Sunday, the 7th inst., the jury unanimously expressed an opinion, whilst acquitting the engineer of any intention to produce that fatal result, that "it did appear to them that sufficient caution had not been observed."

To an application of the jurors for the re-instatement of the engineer, the president of the company returned the following answer:

"Office of the Baltimore and Ohio Rail Road Co. July 16, 1839.

"Gentlemen: I received this morning, your letter of the 13th inst. disclaiming any intention, by your verdict in the inquest in the case of the death of Mary Burton, of causing the suspension of Shipley, the engineer, and preferring a recommendation for his continuance in the employment of the company."

"When I directed Shipley to be suspended until the facts could be fully investigated, I had not seen even the summary of the proceedings before the coroner, as published in the newspapers; but acted upon the official report from the proper department."

"Until the receipt of the testimony taken before the coroner, which, upon my application, has been furnished, it was supposed the engineer perceived the woman on the track at the distance of one hundred yards, and, taking it for granted she could get off before the engine reached her, proceeded with the train without any precaution to remove her, until it was too late to avoid the catastrophe which actually happened. Upon such a state of facts, the want of the requisite judgment and caution in the engineering was too apparent to be overlooked; but inasmuch as an investigation had taken place before the coroner, I deemed it only just, before dismissing him, to order the engineer to be suspended until the inquiry could be made. Such inquiry has been directed, and, in its progress, as well as the facts developed in the coroner's inquest as the opinions and wishes of the individual jurors will be allowed their just weight."

"I would, however, remark, gentlemen, that too great caution cannot be observed upon the part of all persons connected with the conduct and operations of a rail road, and that for the due enforcement of such caution, some apparent rigor even is often indispensable."

"I am, gentlemen very respectfully, your obedt servant,"

"LOUIS McLANE, president.
To Messrs E. K. Morsell, foreman, and Thompson, Bell, Ball, Bizer, Bell and Rearden, jurors empaneled."

We are glad to see so important and just remark as that of the president of the rail road company in the concluding parts of his letter. Coming from so distinguished and intelligent an officer, it cannot help having much weight, we should suppose, upon the minds of the subordinate agents of this company, and of every other rail road company in the union. Indeed, we believe that public opinion will re-echo the sentiment every where that too great caution cannot be observed upon the part of all persons connected with the conduct and operations of a rail road."

RAIL ROADS. The facility of travel is well illustrated by an incident which lately occurred at the late rail road convention, at Utica.

The delegates from Goshen, commenced their journey by turning their backs upon the point of their destination, and traveling eastward, 25 miles—then up the Hudson to Albany, 100 miles—thence by the Mohawk and Hudson, Utica, Syracuse and Auburn rail roads, 170 miles—thence to Cayuga bridge, 8 miles—and thence by steamboat 40 miles, to Utica, 343 miles by rail roads and steamboats, rather than 150 miles by the old mode. A similar result is produced on the northern frontier. Passengers from Ogdensburg thence to Oswego, thence to Syracuse, and then by rail road to Albany. Indeed, the whole travel of the state is concentrating upon that route, which is connected with the southern frontier by the beautiful lakes Oswego, Schenectady, Cayuga, Seneca and Crooked lake, which extend from the rail roads almost to the base of the Alleghany mountains, and with the north by Oneida lake and the Oswego and black river canals.

The towns upon that route already feel the beneficial influence, and overflowing hotels and crowded streets give testimony that our most permanent prosperity is to be derived from the cultivation of our own resources.

HEAD OF THE "BEHEMOTH." In all the remains of the gigantic mastodon, which have been found on this continent, there has not been obtained a single perfect specimen of the head. This, it has been supposed, was occasioned by the comparative thinness and weakness of the upper part of the skull. From this circumstance no opinion could be properly formed of the shape of the head of this extinct animal. This desideratum with the curious and scientific, has been found.

Mr. A. Kolch, the enterprising proprietor of the St. Louis museum, gives notice in the Bulletin of that city, of the 22d June, that the bones of the mastodon, with its entire head, have recently been exhumed in Missouri, about 22 miles south of St. Louis, and are now in his possession, at his museum. In his description of the head, he says:

"The outside formation and peculiar construction of the upper part of the head is different from any quadruped in natural history, that I am acquainted with. It is composed of small cells about three quarters of an inch square, and about three inches deep, covered by a thin cranium, attached to the upper jaw is a snout which projects about eighteen inches over the lower jaw, and which has never been described before."

"The position of the tusks in the head, has been a subject of discussion among naturalists, and they have been placed in the same manner as those of the elephant. It gives me pleasure to state, that I can now settle this question for in the head I have discovered, and found a tusk firmly implanted in the socket, and had it conveyed with great care to my cabinet, and but owing to the ignorance and carelessness of a laborer in carrying it up stairs it was broken off, but its position can be proved by a number of gentlemen of the highest respectability. The tusks are not situated in the same position as those of the elephant, or yet the moose, as was supposed by some. They diverge outwards from the head, with the convexity forward, and the point turning backward in the same plane with the head; the tusk found in the head measured ten feet one inch, from the base to the tip, following the outside of the curvature, and two feet in circumference near the socket. The other tusk measures only nine feet—part of the root is wanting. When placed in the head in their original position, the distance from tip to tip measures sixteen feet. I may add, that it required two stout men to carry the largest tusk, and two yoke of oxen to carry the head and tusks from the place of disinterment to the museum."

"It must have been of the size of this tremendous animal, and what revolutions must this earth have undergone since he trode upon our western plains?"

MORE ATTEMPTS TO BEFRAUD THE CUSTOMS. Some few days ago, Mr. Hyde, head keeper of the New York city prison, received a letter, requesting to make an appointment with the writer on business of great importance. The correspondent of Mr. Hyde, requested a letter to be sent to the post office, directed to Mr. John Boyd, describing the place of meeting, how he was to distinguish Mr. Hyde, &c. Mr. Hyde took counsel, and finally concluded to oblige his invidious friend. Accordingly a letter was despatched to Mr. Boyd, as requested, and an assignment made to meet him in the Park, opposite the old commissioner of Alms house office, at 9 o'clock, p. m. precisely.

Mr. Hyde was to make himself known by standing without his hat. Mr. Hyde next arranged with officers Sparks and Davis that they should station themselves at convenient distances from the place of meeting, and that on Mr. Hyde putting on his hat they should come up and seize his companion. Matters being thus in train, Mr. Hyde repaired to the Park and stood unoccupied. On the City Hall clock striking nine, the unknown approached, and, accosting Mr. Hyde, said, "You are Mr. Hyde, I presume?" Mr. Hyde replied, "I am. What is your business with me?" The stranger then asked, "You have all the keys, I suppose, of the prison, &c.?" "Yes, certainly, I have," said Mr. H. "but what of that?" "What does your question tend?" The stranger then proceeded to say, "There are some papers in the office of the distict attorney, which I wish very much to obtain possession of. If you will aid me to get them, any sum you name shall be yours!" Mr. Hyde then asked, "to what do these papers relate?" His companion replied, "They have reference to a case of perjury and false entry made at the custom house."

Mr. Hyde having now learned all he wished to know, put on his hat. Officer Sparks immediately came up, and seized the unknown. On this he endeavored to thrust his hand into his breast pocket, but was prevented, and straightway taken to the city prison. Being searched, a pistol, rife, bored, and loaded with ball, was found on him. This weapon was what he was endeavoring to get at when Sparks seized his hand. He was recognized as being George A. Schaff, an importing merchant of Pine street, against whom a bill had been found for perjury, in making false entries at the custom house, and who was at liberty on bail. Schaff is now in close confinement, and will be so detained until his trial.

IMPORTANT LAW CASE. A case, very important in its results on the property of Americans dying without a will in England, has lately been decided in that country. Mr. John Hammond, a native of Rhode Island, went to England on mercantile affairs, and whilst on his journey to Liverpool to embark for America, was killed through the overturning of a coach. He left about £1,000 sterling in England, but no will and no relatives in the country. By an act of our own congress, the consuls and vice consuls of the United States in other countries, are directed to take possession of the property of American citizens dying there intestate and without representatives, to give and secure the same, pay debts, and remit the residue to the treasury of the United States, there to remain in trust for those legacies entitled thereto, "provided the law of the country permits it." In conformity with this direction, col. Aspinwall, our consul general took possession of Mr. Hammond's effects; and applied to Messrs. Baring & Co. for a sum of about £600 in their hands belonging to the deceased. Messrs. B. & Co. declined to pay over this money till letters of administration were obtained, and they could have a legal discharge. Application was then made by col. Aspinwall to the proper court for letters of administration. The queen's proctor opposed.

The judge, sir H. Jenner, decided, that the crown had the right to the property of all foreigners who died in England intestate. It has been said, observed the judge, that British consuls in America have the power of the British subjects dying there in similar circumstances, and that the court should enforce a reciprocity. But this power is given by the law of nations; it must be by special enactment, and it does not follow that this country is bound to follow the example. This country has not adopted the principle of reciprocity, and therefore, the rule is not binding upon the court.—Whether it be expedient to make any arrangement by treaty, to enable consuls in foreign countries to administer on the estates of deceased persons of their own country, is a grave question, into which the court is not called upon to enter. I am of opinion in this case, that colonel Aspinwall as consul of the United States, is not the proper person to take administration of the effects of the deceased; I am not satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to show that the administration ought to go as prayed by him. I reject his petition."

The queen's counsel made no claim for the property; nor is it believed that such a thing would be done in any similar case. The property would remain until relatives appeared and took out letters of administration in England.

CIGAR MANUFACTURE. The manufactory of Malaga employs 700 persons (women and children), in making cigars. A good pair of hands at the work may furnish three hundred a day; but as the workman cannot make half that number), taking the average at two hundred, gives a daily supply of 140,000. The manufactory at Seville employs 1,000 men and 1,600 women. These 2,600 persons may be calculated as furnishing, on an average, 250 each per diem; or, altogether, 650,000. Add to this number the 140,000 made at Malaga, and we have 790,000 as the "total of the whole" manufactured daily in Spain. The persons employed in the manufactory of cigars are paid at the rate of one real vellon for fifty, which enables a first rate maker to earn but fifteen pence a day. The best cigars are made entirely of Havana tobacco, and are sold at the factory at the rate of thirty real vellons a hundred, or about three farthings English each. The second quality, composed of mixed tobacco, (that is, the interior of Havana leaf, and the outside of Virginia), costs eighteen real vellons per hundred, or something under a half penny each. It may be seen, from this statement of the cost of cigars of royal manufactory, that smuggling cannot but prosper; since at the Havana the very best cigars are sold for twelve dollars a thousand, (or a trifle above a half penny each), while those of inferior quality may be had for one-fourth that price.

[The number given above as the daily manufacture of cigars in Spain would seem to be exaggerated, as it would amount to more than 247 millions a year; and as there is no exportation of the article from Spain, it can scarcely be supposed that so vast a quantity is consumed in that country alone, in addition to the great amount received from Cuba. There were imported into the United States, from Cuba, in the year 1837, seventy-five millions of cigars, and there were manufactured in the United States perhaps twice that quantity. As our smokers average about five cigars each day, the quantity we have supposed to be manufactured and imported would give to the United States about 1,500,000 smokers.]

A NOBLE ACT. The Boston Mercantile states that, in February last, (the brig Powhatan, cap, Girdler, of Newburyport, in attempting to put to sea in the evening, from Marseilles, was driven from her anchors upon the rocks at the entrance of the harbor. The pilot left her to her fate. Cap. Girdler immediately proceeded in his boat to the United States ship Cyane, then in port, and informed commander John Perivall of the perilous situation of his vessel, when, with a promptness worthy of all praise, a number of boats, with officers, men, anchors, &c. were dispatched to her assistance. The annexed extract from her protests will show the value of the service performed:

"The vessel commenced striking at 12 o'clock, and was fast afloat through the timely and strenuous exertions of the officers and crew of the United States ship Cyane, which were necessary until half past 6 o'clock in the morning, and without which the brig would have been lost."

NEWSPAPERS. Various newspapers are engaged in making comments upon the press of the country, the difficulties it has to contend with—the loose system of payments pursued with regard to it—the necessity of more punctuality on the part of subscribers—of better prices from advertisers, &c. &c. The truth is, there are about three or four times as many papers in the country as are wanted. The whole thing is overdone, or done to death. If there were fewer newspapers, the public would be better served, and the proprietors better supported. In that case, a great improvement in the press would take place, because publishers could afford, from the greater amount of their earnings, to expend more than they do upon their journals.

Nevertheless, we hope that those who are now engaged in attempting to effect an alteration in the system of conducting the financial department of the publishing of newspapers, will persevere until they effect a thorough reform. The proprietors of newspapers must first estimate properly the value of their own time, labor and means, and the efforts they make to earn their money, and the public ought to be satisfied that a debt due to a publisher is as much a debt, as if it was due to a merchant, and ought as punctually to be paid. There is no man who subscribes to, or advertises in, a respectable newspaper, who does not get more than the "worth of his money." [Alexandria Gaz.]

FOREIGN NEWS.

The British Queen steam-ship, lieut. N. Roberts, R. N. commander, arrived at New York on Sunday morning last, in fifteen and a half days from Portsmouth, whence she sailed on the 12th, bringing London dates to the 11th July. The following items of news brought by her express to the Courier and Enquirer:—Business, and Herald.

The political news by this arrival, is not very important. The war in Syria is making progress, but no battle has yet been fought by the Egyptians and Turks. England is quiet—France is quiet—every thing at peace all over Europe.

It was universally expected on the 11th July that the Bank of England would raise the interest to six per cent. The notice, however, was not announced though it was intimated from the bank parlour that the interest would probably be advanced on the following Thursday, the 18th.

The spinners at Manchester have renewed their agreement to "work short," notice of which was published in London on the 11th, and it was supposed that a further decline in cotton would probably follow.

The bullion in the possession of the bank of England has been still further reduced—whilst the accounts from the manufacturing districts are entirely gloomy as to the export trade. This all tends to the impossibility of describing any real improvement in the general condition of monetary affairs.

On the 8th, Mr. Hume made a motion in the house of commons for a select committee to inquire into the pecuniary transactions of the bank of England since the resumption of cash payments; and particularly to ascertain how far these transactions produced the alarming crisis of the manufacturing, commercial and financial affairs of the country in 1825-6, and in 1836-7; and also to inquire whether, as the bank of England is at present constituted, there ever can be stability in the currency, or confidence in the commercial transactions of the country.

American securities remained all unsaleable, unless at the most ruinous quotations, with the exception of the shares of Bank of the United States, which have been sold in considerable amounts at £23 7s. 6d., and on the 11th were withheld by one individual party unless at £23 10s.

Even one offer for the best of Pennsylvania stocks, at a price lower than 90, had gone off without effect, and there was no improvement since the departure of the Great Western steam ship.

In the cotton market affairs had become considerably worse; for the fall at Liverpool had been no less than 1-2d. per lb. during the short time which has elapsed since the Great Western sailed.

It is said, an authority of private letters by the British Queen, that the proposed arrangement between the bank of England and the bank of France has been declined, by which the former institution will receive a large amount of specie.

A letter from the most eminent firm in the trade, states that "the largest spinners buy only from 40 to 50 bales per day, merely to keep open the mills; and any person desirous of speculating might almost make his own prices."

The crops in England are said to be very promising, and in some parts the harvest has already commenced.

The latest intelligence received in England from this country was of the 20th June.

The budget of the chancellor of the exchequer presents some novel features. Breadstuffs to the amount of £7,500,000 have been imported into England last year. An issue of exchequer bills to the amount of £7,893,955 is to be made to meet the charge of the consolidated fund. The surplus of 1839 is $2,124,054, being larger than the surplus of 1838. Penny postage is to be adopted by the government.

American boundary. The London Globe says:—Her Majesty's government has selected two commissioners to proceed immediately by the British Queen to North America, to examine into the possibility of simplifying this arduous undertaking, and bringing the question to a prompt and honorable settlement. Lieutenant-colonel Mudge, of the royal engineers, an officer of high reputation in geodetic operations, is one of the commissioners. The other is Mr. Featherstonhough. This gentleman has been selected as well for his scientific attainments, his very intimate acquaintance with the details of this troublesome question, as for the topographical knowledge which his extensive travels in North America have enabled him to acquire.

There appear to have been some further disturbances in Birmingham, during which, according to a letter published in the London Chronicle, of the 10th, the London police detachment acted in the most disgraceful manner. The letter in question was read in the house of commons on the day of its publication, when Lord John Russell stated that he believed it to be altogether untrue. He said he had received a communication from the mayor of Birmingham, giving an entirely different account of the affair. The mayor ended his letter by stating that the peace of the town was nearly ruined by its ordinary state of quiet, and that very little delay would occur before business proceeded in its ordinary course.

There had also been a riot at Ramsgate, occasioned by the committal of some men for hawking fish. In the course of it, some of the police were roughly handled, and the prisoners were rescued from the building in which they were confined.—

They were recaptured, however, the succeeding day, and committed to Sandwich jail. This occasioned fresh disturbances, during which some windows, &c. were broken.

The official quarterly report of the revenue was presented to parliament on the 6th inst. The total income for the quarter was 11,352,050 pounds, being an increase upon the corresponding quarter of last of 308,175 pounds. The revenue for the year, ending on the 31st inst, was 45,949,430 pounds, being an increase of 2,076,659 pounds on that of the year ending on the same date of 1838. The increase in the quarter's revenue is to be found in every department of finances but two—the stamps and post office. In the first there is a falling off of 44,711 pounds; in the latter of 12,000 pounds.

The papers publish full details of the death of lady Flora Hastings. Her remains were conveyed to Scotland for interment. At the request of her father a post mortem examination of the body was made, and the result forever put at rest all doubts as to her innocence of the charge that had been preferred against her character.

The whig ministry have, it is said, given up all intention of retiring from office.

Mr. and Mrs. Webster are announced among the guests at lord Liverpool's soiree on the 8th.

Fourth of July in Liverpool.—On the anniversary of the Independence of America, the vessels in the various docks belonging to the United States, hoisted their flags. The captains dined at the Grecian Hotel, Dale street, and the mates, to the number of sixty, dined together in Cheshire. The American consul, Mr. Ogden, christened his second child on the same day, and gave a sumptuous breakfast on the occasion.

Letters from the Hague state that the marriage between the prince of Orange and the princess Sophia, of Wirtemberg, is null, according to the laws of the country, in consequence of some informality in the preliminary proceedings.

Three of the French insurgents who were upon their trial at our last advices, have been found guilty. Their names are Barbe, Bernard and Mignon. The former too, it is supposed, will be condemned to death, and the last named to perpetual imprisonment.

Accounts of an unpleasant nature had reached Paris from Lyons. They stated that an insurrection was apprehended in that city, but that the authorities had taken the necessary measures for preventing, or at all events, for suppressing it. The great manufacturing house of D— had stopped payment for 1,100,000l.

Our German letters represent as certain the marriage of the heir to the Russian throne with the princess Marie of Hesse Darmstadt.

Among the measures by the Queen are Mr. Mudge and Mr. Featherstonhough, appointed by the English government to make a survey of the boundary line, between Maine and New Brunswick.

Junius Smith, esq. a director of the company, and the father of Atlantic steam navigation, is also a passenger.

Correspondence of the Courier and Enquirer.

London, July 10th, 1839. By extraordinary exertions on the part of the proprietors of the British Queen, this leviathan in steam navigation, has departed from the Thames this morning, and will leave Portsmouth to-morrow night. It is needless to remark upon the intense interest which has been excited in this country as to the fate of this magnificent vessel; for to you the result will be the earliest known.

It is, with regret, that I am compelled to continue the description of the same gloomy condition of monetary and mercantile affairs, as that which prevailed at the time of the departure of the Great Western steam ship. The pressure for money has been diminished in only the very slightest degree; for certainly, during yesterday and this morning, the payment of the half yearly dividends on the 3 per cent. consols, may be said to have brought forward a slight increase of capital into the stock exchange.

For the only cheering symptom to be noticed is that the dividends have not been demanded in gold to any usual extent, and there is consequently some expectation that the money market will be materially relieved by the large additions to the circulation created by the payment of many millions of bank of England notes. The improvement, however, if any, is yet of the most uncertain and trifling extent; and the foreign exchanges for the last two foreign post days, having been decidedly adverse—and the bullion in the possession of the bank of England having been still further reduced—whilst the accounts from the manufacturing districts are entirely gloomy as to the export trade.

Nothing now is of so much importance in the affairs of this country as the prospects of the crop of grain. The weather has been changeable, but not altogether unfavorable during the four days which have elapsed since the sailing of the Great Western steamer ship. So fickle, however, is the climate of England, that it is yet impossible to conjecture the final prospects of the country with reference to the supply for the ensuing—either for good or for evil—undoubtedly most important mercantile and political year.

The South America packet ship of the 19th, from New York, arrived at Liverpool last night. The letters are filled with accounts of depression of stocks—pressure for money, and unfavorable intelligence from the southern states.

London, July 11. The bank broker was again in the English stock market with exchequer bills, of which he effected sales to the amount of 20,000*l.* at 20*s.* premium. It appears to be generally understood now that these sales were for account of the bank. Rather more activity was displayed in business to-day, attributable to the failure of one of the jobbers in the house, and the necessity arising therefrom for those having had transactions with him to re-arrange their books. The failure was of a trifling amount, his differences being reported at £17,000*l.* and 8,000*l.* only. Consols fluctuated a little during the day, and left off nearly as before, for the account being 93 5-8, and for money 92 to 1-3, India 100, Bank stock was 101 1-2 to 2; Exchequer bills, 20*s.* to 22*s.* premium.

London, July 9, 1839. Review of the corn trade. By news from the south of Europe, we learn that though partial injury has been done to the growing crops in some districts by the severe storms experienced there during the last month, the prospects for the coming harvest are on the whole favorable.

In Italy, wheat was rapidly approaching maturity; and a letter from Leghorn, dated the 26th ult., states that samples of the new produce were speedily expected at market; this coupled with the continued arrivals of supplies from Odesa, &c. have caused the trade to become exceedingly depressed, and occasioned a considerable fall in the prices; some parcels of Danube of tolerable good quality, which had cost the importers 12 1-2 livres, or about 3*s.* 3*d.* were offered at equal to 27*s.* 6*d.* per quarter free on board; other descriptions at proportionally low rates. The weather continues fine, and reaping was fast drawing to a conclusion.

At most of the upper Baltic ports the value of grain has been pretty steadily maintained, and in some instances a slight advance has even been obtained on former prices; this was the case at Slettin on the 25th June, the English mail having brought orders for the purchase of wheat, but subsequently the market became dull again, and on the 29th ult. the enquiry had again subsided.

From Danzig we have letters of the 25th June; the holders of wheat had for some days previous insisted on higher prices for wheat, and one or two small parcels had been disposed of at an improvement of 1*s.* per quarter; the business had, however, been checked in consequence of the rise, and the London letters of the 21st holding out no encouragement to expect a renewed demand, sellers had consented to take previous rates, at which several oats changed hands, 50 lasts of very fine high mixed new wheat brought 47*s.* 6*d.* and 50 lasts of do. do. old at 4*s.* good old high mixed had been sold at 43*s.* 6*d.* to 41*s.* the best runs of high mixed Volthyna, 6*s.* of crop in 1838, at 42*s.* 6*d.* mixed Volthyna of indifferent color at 40*s.* 6*d.*; good red Galicia at 41*s.* to 41*s.* 6*d.* and inferior mixed at 38*s.* per gros on board, the weight of the best parcels averaged about 61 to 62 lbs. and of the inferior kinds 60 to 61 lbs. per bushel. Rye had further declined in price, 16*s.* 6*d.* to 17*s.* 6*d.* being the top quotations. In other articles nothing of importance had taken place. The weather was wet, which interfered with the working of grain. There were plenty of vessels seeking freights, and one had been fixed for Leith at 4*s.* 6*d.* per quarter for wheat, a further reduction.

A letter from Hamburg of the 2d inst. states, that accounts had been received there from Pomerania and Mecklenburgh, complaining of injury suffered by the growing crops in that tract of country by heavy rains; a great many fields were said to have been completely laid, and otherwise damaged. The Hamburg market was more animated for rye, and about 2,500 quarters had been sold, partly for shipment to England, and partly for the manufacture of flour, at rather enhanced prices: 59 lbs. red Saal had brought 48*s.* 9*d.*; 59 1-2 lbs. do. 49*s.* 3*d.* and good red qualities, weighing 60 lbs. per bushel, 50 per quarter. In other kinds of grain nothing of consequence had been done.

The weather has been gradually improving since this day week, and most of the accounts from the country state, that with the exception of an occasional thunder shower, no rain has fallen. In the early part of the week, the temperature was low, but since last Thursday we have experienced an increase of warmth, which no doubt has much benefited the growing grain crops; complaints, however, still reach us, some of which no doubt are well founded, and there appears to be just grounds to fear that the coming harvest will be late, and consequently precarious, which with our exhausted stocks, is of itself a sufficient reason to calculate on present prices being at least maintained.

The trade for wheat has been exceedingly firm at all the principal country markets held during the week; and owing to the very scanty nature of the supplies of English, fine qualities have generally advanced 1*s.* to 2*s.* per quarter; at Liverpool the improvement has been greater, and a good deal of business was done there on Tuesday, but on Friday, the trade became less animated.

The intelligence received from Scotland since our last, respecting the progress of vegetation, is on the whole, favorable, though in some of the northern counties, the weather has been both cold and wet, but this has not been the case in the south. Wheat nevertheless met a fair sale at Edinburgh on Wednesday; Oats were also in tolerable request, and maintained previous rates. At Glasgow on the same day there was a fair demand for wheat and flour, and the latter article in some cases brought 1*s.* per sack above former rates. Oats were 6*d.* to 1*s.* lower.

Letters from the north of Ireland state that the rain had succeeded by warm dry weather, which had caused the face of the country to assume a very flourishing appearance, and caused some decline in the value of grain, notwithstanding the scanty character of the deliveries from the farmers.

At Mark Lane scarcely a sample of English wheat has appeared since Monday last, the rates of that day have consequently been firmly supported, and if any superior samples had been offered they would probably have met a ready sale to the millers at fully previous terms.

Of foreign wheat the arrivals have been liberal, 35,385 quarters having been reported up to Saturday evening; this, however, has not increased the quantity on sale, as holders have generally given directions to land in bond, preferring to take the chance of a subsequent reduction in the duty, to paying the present rate, (13*s.* 8*d.* per quarter).

House of Commons, July 9. Texas. Mr. O'Connell's bill for putting a question, which he had given notice, relative to certain persons who had given a portion of the Mexican territory, calling themselves the state of Texas. Were any negotiations pending between this government and those persons for the purpose of recognizing the independence of that state?

Lord Palmerston stated that an application had been made to the government in the early part of last year, by persons from Texas, for the purpose of knowing whether the government were preparing to acknowledge the independence of Texas. The answer given to that application was, that the general principle of the government was to acknowledge every state that was de facto independent, but under the circumstances at present existing with respect to Texas, they were not prepared to adopt that course with respect to it. As it was known that our minister at Mexico had successfully negotiated between France and Mexico, instructions had been sent to endeavor to effect a similar arrangement between Mexico and Texas.

Mr. O'Connell asked if the communications had relation to the slave trade.

Lord Palmerston said, the communications were of a general nature, and did not include any detail of that kind.

TURKEY.

London, July 11. We have received by express letters from our correspondent in Constantinople to the 19th ult. inclusive. They state that in order to recover his popularity, which had declined since the imposition of a house-tax to provide for the expenses of the quarantine establishment, the sultan had not only abolished that impost and caused the restitution of the sums already paid on account of it, but also the monopoly of bread hitherto enjoyed by government. These remissions produced joy throughout the Turkish capital.

The health of the sultan has been improved. The correspondent states that the statement is confirmed by our Paris letters, as we mention elsewhere) that the representations and the menaces of the French government had failed to dissuade the sultan from his warlike resolves. The pasha of Trebisond marched on the 12th ult. at the head of 10,000 irregular infantry and 5,000 cavalry, for the army. Tamer pasha was about returning to Aidin to place himself at the head of the troops in that province, and proceed with them to the camp at Scionia. The forces put in motion by the porte were estimated at 200,000 men.

The correspondent of the London Times writes from Constantinople under date of 19th July.

A scene occurred yesterday at the admiralty which has produced much sensation among the frank population, the chief of the navy board (Moustapha bey) having, during an interview with the sultan's ship builder (Mr. Rhodes), used abusive language, which the feelings of an American could not put up with, the latter raised his pipe and broke it on the insolent Ottoman's head. The circumstances of the case having been laid before the sultan, every one is anxiously awaiting for his verdict.

HOLLAND.

The troops of Holland are quietly taking possession of the long disputed territory of Hamburg and Luxemburg, and the large army which has been so long kept up by that power on the Belgian frontier is greatly dispersing.

Liverpool cotton market, July 8. The market throughout the week has been extremely depressed and to effect sales even to the extent of the limited wants of the trade, a decline of fully 3-8 per lb. has been submitted to in the common and middling classes of American, with a still further reduction on the better qualities.

The sales amount only to 11,950 bales (including 250 American for export) of which 370 Sea Island at 20*d.* to 28*d.* 2,240 Bowed 7*d.* to 9*d.* 2,600 Mobile, Alabama and Tennessee 6-3-4d to 7-0-3*d.* 3,790 New Orleans 6-3-4d to 10 1-2*d.* The sales to-day amount to about 1,500 bags at 1-8*d.* to 1*d.* per lb. lower in prices than the quotations of Friday last. The market on the whole is exceedingly flat.

Liverpool cotton market, July 9. The cotton trade continues very flat, but prices were not lower. The sales were limited, only 1,000 bags having met with purchasers, and the market closed with a dull tone. 230 Bengal, 4 1-2 to 5; 100 Surat, 4 5-8 to 5 1-4; 270 Maranhun, 8 1-4 to 8 5-8; 40 Carthagena, 5 1-2; 20 Peruvian, 8 3-4; 530 American, 6 3-8 to 9.

Liverpool, July 5. Cotton. Manufactures continue in a very depressed state. Stocks are rapidly accumulating, and money is extremely scarce—all of which circumstances naturally tend to produce a stagnation in the demand for cotton. The business transacted this week was of a very limited nature, and no sales were effected except to those in immediate want, although American descriptions were offered at a decline of 3-8 per lb. and 1-4 per lb. reduction was submitted to on all other sorts except Brazils, which maintained last Friday's rates. The entire sales amount to 11,950 bags including 50 Surat, and 250 American bags for export. The imports amount to 29,760 bags, comprising 25,002 American, 631 Brazilian, 20,030 Mediterranean and 2,124 East India.

Liverpool, July 10. Since the date of the above, the gloom in the cotton market has increased, and prices have further declined 1-2*d.* per lb. The quotation for fair Upland is about 7*d.* and in some measure nominal—the average business about 1,500 bales per day. There are no symptoms of improvement in the money market. Flour 3*s.* a 3*s.* 6*d.* per bu. duty paid, and the duty 8*s.* 2*d.* per bu. Turpentine 10*s.* a 11*s.* 2*d.* per cwt. inferior to price new. The demand for tobacco is nearly suspended.

Liverpool cotton market, July 9th. The wheat market (in some degree influenced by the fine weather) has been less lively than during the present week. There has however been a good steady trade with little or no change in prices. United States sweet flour has sold in quantity at 3*s.* to 3*s.* 6*d.* per bu. and there has been more enquiry for home manufacture at 4*s.* to 5*s.* per 280 lbs.; at today's market wheat found a fair demand at full prices.

Manchester, July 10. State of trade. There was little more enquiry for yarn yesterday than on the preceding Tuesday, at prices about a farthing per lb. below those which prevailed at that time. The prices of cotton having declined more than a half penny during the interval, the position of the spinners may be said to be slightly improved; but it is still far from being satisfactory, as, even at the present prices of cotton, a loss must be incurred on all the yarn spun. For goods there was not much demand yesterday; and so far as we could learn, very little business was done. In consequence of the continued unsatisfactory state of the market, the spinners and manufacturers of Ashton, Staly bridge, Hyde, and the neighborhood, whose second term of agreement for working short time had expired, determined to renew it; and a fresh agreement, to the same effect as before, was very generally signed yesterday, and will no doubt be universally acted upon in that neighborhood.

Antwerp, July 6. Since the last day or two the demand for coffee has been more animated, and 500 bags Brazil were taken for consumption at 29c. per half kilo. In sugars nothing doing, all waiting for the sale at auction which takes place on the 9th. Java rice has experienced a slight improvement, but in Carolina nothing took place.

THE BRITISH QUEEN.

In the New York Courier and Enquirer we find the following account of this magnificent steamer, and her first voyage across the Atlantic. It was written by col. Webb, the senior editor of the Courier, who returned home in the Queen:

The Queen sailed from London on the evening of the 10th, but, owing to the state of the tide, did not pass the bar at the mouth of the Thames, until the 11th, and reached Portsmouth about 5 A. M. on the 12th. She left Portsmouth at half-past 12, M. blowing fresh gale from the east; and, with the exception of light northerly airs on Friday and Saturday—so light, that the velocity of the ship made it at times a head wind—we have not had our sails set twenty-four hours during the passage.—The wind has been uniformly "dead ahead," blowing very fresh at all times, and causing a very heavy head sea. At intervals we have had fresh summer gales; which, while they have retarded our arrival, have fully demonstrated the important fact, that in the same ratio you increase the size of the steamer will you increase her safety and comfort.

The Queen is indeed a noble ship—one which, from her gigantic proportions, may not be compared with any other merchant vessel—and capable of being made the most comfortable passage ship that ever floated. In her construction and outfit, no expense has been spared to render her as perfect as practicable; and although her exact cost has not yet been ascertained, it is estimated at about $375,000, which includes her furniture and stores of every kind. Her grand saloon is a beautiful and magnificent apartment; and the berths connected with it are certainly very superior in comfort and convenience to any others ever constructed; but then, there are only twenty-four in number, and although some of those in the forward cabin are tolerably pleasant, I can bear witness that the fifty or sixty berths in the lower saloon, including all aft, except those in the grand saloon, are absolutely uninhabitable, and should not, under any circumstances, be taken by persons having the slightest regard either for their health or comfort. I am very sorry to be obliged to say aught against the accommodations of this noble ship; but the truth is, her sleeping accommodations are so miserably arranged, that she can only accommodate a small number of persons comfortably, and she cannot fail to be a most unprofitable concern, unless those who have control of her promptly yield their theoretical opinions to the practical demonstrations of her faults in fitting up; which this voyage has so clearly made apparent.

The Great Western made her first voyage to New York with her sleeping apartments somewhat similarly arranged; that is, she had a lower saloon, which, like that on board the Queen, was very properly denominated "the catacombs;" but she has since had a poop deck placed upon her, filled with state rooms, which renders her decidedly the most comfortable passage ship which England has yet sent into our waters. But the greater size of the Queen, her spacious saloon, and the free ventilation of which she is capable—certainly placed it within the power of her owners, to make her as superior in comfort as she is in size and splendor, to all other steam vessels. To effect this, it is only necessary to construct a poop deck for her companion way aft, with a line of state rooms on each side, and a promenade both above and below; while, until this alteration is made, she can only accommodate with comfort, about 35 or 40 passengers in her berth.

With the exception of her cabin arrangements, there can exist no cause of complaint against the Queen, when we take into consideration that this is her first trip. Her stores were all of the very best quality—her wines excellent and in abundance—and although the steward's department is not what it should be, there can be no doubt but all the inconveniences which were incidental to a first voyage of such a ship, will now disappear, and the internal police be promptly perfected.

Of capt. Roberts I may, with the greatest safety and justice, speak in the highest terms of commendation. He is intelligent, gentlemanly and affable; and possesses the rare fact of rendering himself agreeable to his passengers without in any way endangering his position as master of the ship. This is a virtue not always understood, and the want of which is justly considered a total disqualification for the command of a packet. Captain Roberts is also very fortunate in his officers, who, like him, are attached to the British navy, gentlemanly in their department, and thoroughly conversant with their duties.

The British Queen is 1,863 tons burthen, builder's measurement, and upwards of 2,000 tons by custom house measurement. Her model is purely American, and with a wind—although we have had no opportunity of testing—cannot fail to make unusually rapid trips across the Atlantic. She is more buoyant than was anticipated—that is, her cargo, coal, provisions, passengers, &c. &c. did not sink her in the water as much as was anticipated; and in consequence, since the consumption of some seven hundred tons of coal, water and provisions, her paddle wheels have not taken sufficient hold of the water, to propel her at a rate equivalent to the power of her engines. But this will be remedied by taking in a full cargo of several hundred tons of iron ballast in New York, previous to her sailing, on the first of August, in company with the Great Western. No effort will be spared to get her off on that day, and all England are on the qui vive to ascertain which of the magnificent floating palaces will make the quickest trip home. Large odds are offered on the Queen.

The managing director of the company, Mr. Laird, who drafted her model, and superintended her construction, also came passenger in the Queen, with a view to examine her working, and to note what alteration or improvements may be made in her accommodations. Immediately on his return, the President of 2,400 tons will be launched; and I have no doubt but the experience which shortly be acquired in the Queen, will enable her owners to make her altogether the most commodious and agreeable passage ship ever known. One thing is certain; the company are prepared to expend any amount of money which may be required to render their vessels perfect in all respects, and with competent commanders and experienced stewards, there can be no doubt of their success.

The following letter from one of the passengers in the British Queen, will be read with interest, furnishing as it does a particular notice of each day's progress of this noble vessel in her recent voyage across the Atlantic:

Saturday, July 27th, 1839.

DEAR SIR: Presuming you would be gratified to hear a statement of our passage across the Atlantic in this beautiful ship, and fearing I may have no other spare time than the present, previous to our arrival, (which will doubtless be to-morrow), I will give you a brief but correct account, before the storm of pilots boarding, landing, &c. &c. falls upon me.

We left Portsmouth on the 12th instant, at half past 12 o'clock, P. M. with the wind strong from S. W. with a head sea, and a thick hazy horizon, engine making 11 revolutions, until 7, P. M. when we increase to 13.

10th.—Fine clear weather, but wind dead ahead, with a long swell from the westward; 14 revolutions; lat. 49 24 lon. 5 45—distance 275 miles.

14th.—Wind W. small rain; heavy head sea; wind increases towards evening. She rides like a Queen, 13 revolutions; lat. 49 54, lon. 11 29—distance 218 miles.

15th.—Strong westerly wind and head sea; running 13 revolutions; running gallantly over the billows; ships no water; no strain; but proceeds with great ease; lat. 49 23, lon. 15 50—distance 151 miles.

16th.—Wind S. W. strong, with a tumbling cross sea; thick weather coming on. Ship behaves nobly—rides very majestically, without the least strain. 12 o'clock, blowing a gale from the westward; Queen rides beautifully, and see her, by the mere force of steam power, moving on at the rate of 8 or 9 knots per hour, against wind and sea, is a sight worthy of all admiration. 4 P. M. strong head wind whistling through the rigging; strong rolling wind, with a long swell on the wheel, so easy does she steer; 11 revolutions; lat. 48 56 lon. 21 8—distance 210 miles.

17th.—Cloudy, wind fresh N. N. W. dead ahead; 12 revolutions; sea runs high, but she rides very handsomely, and though a strong wind whistles through her rigging, it makes no other impression upon her than what arises from the increased resistance she has to overcome. Lat. 48 6, long. 25 4, distance 198 miles.

18th.—Fine morning; head wind sea, blowing fresh. 12 M.; heavy rolling sea from N. which sensibly affected the crockery on the lurch table and in the steward's pantry, but fortunately she has not yet broken her back, which some of our friends in London were so kind as to predict. Lat. 46 56, long. 30 10, dist. 193 miles.

19th.—Long head sea, wind dead ahead, 13 revolutions; no sails, but running off finely. Lat. 46 13, long. 34 48, dist. 200 miles.

20th.—Wind ahead, with head sea; blowing fresh; going finely against all oppositions; 14 revolutions; no motion, wind increasing, sea rising, ship rolling; no more empty stomachs than usual; speed reduced to 9 revolutions; high sea all night. Lat. 45 30, long. 29 1, dist. 182 miles.

21st.—Sunday morning. Light clouds, wind fresh from N. N. W.; a long rolling sea; no sails, no observation to-day; 11 revolutions. Lat. 45 4, long. 42, dist. 130 miles.

22d.—Wind continues dead ahead, smoother sea, cloudy and hazy; 15 revolutions; ship so steady and quiet that one hardly knows she is under way. 10 o'clock, thick fog; regular cold bank weather; steam working expansively, cut off at half stroke. Lat. 44 43, long. 16 27, distance 190 miles.

23d.—On the banks last night and this morning; thick rainy weather, wind W. S. W., smooth sea; running off finely, 15 revolutions. Lat. 43 40, long. 51 20, distance 224 miles.

24th.—Wind and long sea from W. 14 revolutions; rain all the morning. 11 o'clock, got an observation; sun glancing occasionally, swell subsiding; 8 o'clock, 15 revolutions; sea calm; running off finely. Lat. 43 18, long. 55 50, distance 206 miles.

25th.—Wind N. set fore-top-sail, topgallant sail, for the first time. 12 M. wind freshens; running off in beautiful style; revolutions 16 to 18. Lat. 42 23, long. 60 30, distance 224 miles.

26th.—6 o'clock, wind S. E.; set sail. 7, wind hauls to W.; all sails furled. 12, wind W. good breeze; revolutions steady, 15 7 P. M. smooth sea; running off gaily and beautifully; no motion, quiet as a boat upon the Hudson; lat. 41 14, long. 65 34, distance 240 miles.

27th.—A beautiful day; very warm; perfectly calm in the morning. 10, P. M. fine breeze from N. N. W.; trysail and jib set; going off charmingly; smooth sea; 16 revolutions; lat. 40 19, lon. 70 39—distance 240 miles, which make us 135 miles from Sandy Hook, which we expect to reach by 4 or 5 o'clock in the morning, and to be landed speedily after the health officer comes on board. I could say much in favor of this fine steam ship, but she speaks for herself. We shall have made the passage, against strong head winds and sea, in 15 days and 12 hours; which under all the circumstances is a very capital passage. She is a most charming and beautiful sea boat, very strong and substantial, and as safe a conveyance across the Atlantic as ever floated on its bosom. I am, with much respect your most ob't servant,

J. H. S.

LORD BROUGHAM.

There is no gentleman within the circle of our acquaintance, personal or public, with whose name are associated a greater assortment of unsavory epithets than my lord Brougham and Vaux has power to boast of. Our noble friend of the Toronto Patriot, calls him a scoundrel; and other editors, in England and elsewhere, are in the habit of decorating him with such goodly titles as quack, mount-bank, drunkard, rascal, egotist, bungler, &c. &c. Man-tie him his lordship does on his feet, in his own fashion, nightly enjoying the dust on his knees, and taking an especial pleasure in gently dropping a few words of sarcasm upon every body that happens to come within reach, no matter of what party in politics, science or religion. His latest application of it was to the right reverend bench of bishops—whom he favored, in the course of a debate on his beer bill, with the following left-handed compliment: In the course of the discussion, lord Brougham, replying to lord Melbourne, (whom he called by mistake his "learned friend," but, correcting himself, said "God knows he is not my learned, but my noble, and on this subject, ignorant friend"), adverted to the thin attendance of members, and especially to the absence of the bishops from the house on this occasion.

He was sorry to see, from the aspect of the house, that the present critical hour had had the effect of sadly thinning their lordships numbers. Their lordships liked the beer bill little, but they liked remaining in the house after half-past seven o'clock less. Their lordships liked to see a good state of morality in the country—the tranquil order of society they dearly loved—it was the very apple of their eye; but there was another affection, operating upon certain delicate organs in the constitution of noble lords still more intimately than those connected with the peace, order and purity of society, and reminding them of what had been called the most important event of existence, that of dinner. (Laughter). "Am glad to find," said lord Brougham, turning to the Episcopal bench, "that my observation is not confined to the lay lords; it extends equally to those who are the appointed guardians of public morals and virtue. How often have I heard the beer houses denounced by the right reverend occupants of that bench! There is hardly a bishop whom I have not very heartily, for glorifying your lordships from this very place, for God's sake to apply a remedy to that which makes all our preaching and teaching vain, and to reform those nests of drunkenness, for the sake of those plagues. And now that I come forward at their instigation—that I lend myself as their coadjutor—that I put myself as an humble instrument in the hands of the guardians of morality and religion—but two out of six and twenty right reverend prelates will sacrifice their dinner, their regard to their belly, which is their God." (Laughter.)

Lord Salisbury rose to order, and the following scene ensued.

Lord Salisbury—"I move that the noble and learned lord's words be taken down."

Lord Brougham—"That they may be taken down correctly, I think I had better repeat them. I was saying that the bench of bishops—"

Lord Kenyon—"I rise to order. The moment the words are objected to, no time should be lost in taking them down."

Lord Brougham—"I am just repeating them, that the clerk may be at no loss. The bench of bishops, more than all the lay peers of the realm, have experienced their strong sense of the evil effects of beer houses to the morals of the people under their care; and it is chiefly at their instigation that I have brought forward a measure as their coadjutor, and an humble instrument in their hands, for the purpose of putting down what they abominate as prejudicial to the morals of the people—"

The marquis of Salisbury—"These are not the words."

Lord Brougham—"Allow me to finish the sentence: I am getting on. But I find that the whole twenty-six prelates—"

Lord Kenyon—"I rise again to order. A noble friend of mine has called the noble and learned lord to order, and he must state the reasons why he did call him to order."

Lord Brougham—"The words must first be taken down."

Considerable confusion here prevailed in the house, two or three noble lords speaking at once; which was terminated by the rising of Lord Ellenborough, who said, that in point of fact the opportunity had now passed. (Shouts of "hear, hear!" from lord Brougham.) The rules of the house required that the words should be taken down instanter.

The marquis of Salisbury hoped the noble and learned lord would at least explain his meaning.

Lord Brougham—"I have no objection to state my words. I said that the bench of bishops, at whose instigation I have brought forward this measure, and in those hands I have been a humble tool, out of their great regard for the morals of the people, had sacrificed all personal considerations, and had attended by two of their coadjutors upon the present occasion—(Laughter)—and having the greatest veneration for the bench of bishops—(Laughter)—I felt peculiar pain that no more of them were here." That was all he meant.

AMERICAN AND BELGIAN RAIL ROADS.
From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

The most complete and intelligent survey of the rail roads of the United States which has yet been made, we presume, is that which has been made during the last eight months by a distinguished foreign engineer and author, F. A. Chevalier de Gerstner. This gentleman, after having built the first rail road, and one of the longest, on the continent of Europe, which has been in operation from the year 1832, 130 miles in length, connecting the rivers Mainau and Danube, in the government of Austria—and subsequently, in 1836 and 1837, one of the most perfect and successful, leading from St. Petersburg to Zarskoe-selo, constructed under the immediate patronage of the emperor Nicholas, and intended as the commencement of a rail road from St. Petersburg to Moscow, a distance of 420 miles—came to the United States in November last, and has, since that time, made a thorough examination of the rail roads of the United States.—When he was in this city some months since, he showed an intimate acquaintance with the minutest details of the different modes of construction, with the various kinds of machinery, and with the methods of management; and in his examination of the different rail roads, some of which he visited repeatedly, for the purpose of thorough inquiry into improvements of any kind, took notes of the expenses of construction, repairs and management—amount of business and income—the mode of keeping accounts, and such other details as would afford to his intelligent and discriminating mind, all the light which is to be derived from the varied experience of the conductors of all these works.—On his return to Europe, he will doubtless furnish a report of great interest and value. He is now, or recently was, in the western country, where he has printed, for the information of his friends in the United States, a brief report, embodying a part of the results of his investigations upon the American rail roads, and comparing them with the results furnished in the latest official reports of the system of rail roads constructed by the government of Belgium. These facts are curious, as this is the first authentic statement of the kind, embracing any considerable number of these works, which has been published.

Mr. de Gerstner states, that after inspecting the rail roads between Albany and Lake Erie, he proceeded to the eastern states, visited the rail roads of Massachusetts, and proceeded thence through New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia and Alabama, to New Orleans, visiting all the rail roads in different states. He proceeded thence up the Mississippi, and inspected the internal improvements of the western states, and was about to proceed to examine those of Pennsylvania. He states that he had already passed over more than 2,000 miles of rail roads in the United States, and had been every where received with the greatest kindness. The presidents, directors and engineers of the different rail road lines, had given him not only their printed reports, but had laid before him with the greatest liberality their books and accounts, in order to give him every kind of information. He says,

"I fulfil my duty, when I publicly acknowledge that a free and enlightened people, where all public works are based on the same principle of publicity, and where secrets do not exist." We copy from his statement the following passages:

"According to the facts collected during my travels since my arrival in New York, there are now over three thousand miles of rail roads now completed and in operation in the United States; 425 locomotives, of which the greatest number were made in this country, run on the several rail roads, and I believe up to the end of 1839, the length of rail roads in the United States may amount to 4,100 miles. The capital expended on the rail roads now in operation, is about sixty millions of dollars, or an average cost of twenty thousand dollars per mile, for which sum the rail roads with the buildings, have been constructed and the necessary locomotives and cars bought.

"Several rail roads have been undertaken with insufficient means, and the shareholders and themselves under the necessity of employing the income of the first years in improving the rail road, in building engine houses, &c. and purchase locomotives and cars. In consequence of this the shareholders get, during that time, no dividends, but the rail road still yielded a good income. Other rail roads, when finished, paid from five to ten per cent. income to the stockholders, others have not yet paid any dividends for want of a sufficient number of passengers and freight. The average result of the rail roads now in operation in the United States is that they give a yearly interest of five and a half per cent. on the capital invested. This result must be regarded as very satisfactory, because the greatest part of the lines have only been a few years in operation.

"On all lines there is a yearly increase of at least 15 to 20 per cent. in the gross income, so that even those lines which do not pay now, will give, in a few years, a handsome dividend. According to these statements, based on the communications collected in this country, it seems no doubt, that the large capital invested in rail roads, in the United States, will not only produce an incalculable benefit to the country but likewise pay the stockholders a dividend, which, under good management, by the constant progress in population and trade, must likewise from year to year increase."

Mr. de Gerstner having recently received the last reports of the Belgian rail roads, proceeds to give an abstract of the history and progress of those works—of the cost, traffic and revenue, and to compare them with the results of his observation on the American roads. These works were projected by King Leopold, who adopted the enlightened policy of undertaking a great public work, for the encouragement of industry, the employment of labor, for strengthening, consolidating and ennobling the country, and to serve as a model to other countries, and to the interest of the state. He ordered the whole country to be surveyed by able engineers, the necessary plans and estimates formed, and on the 1st of May, 1834, a law was proclaimed, for the introduction of a system of rail roads, through the whole kingdom, in different directions, to be executed at the expense of the state. These rail roads lead to seaports at two points—Antwerp and Ostend—connect with France at two, and with Germany at one—and all unite in one centre.

"The news of the gigantic work" says Mr. de Gerstner, "undertaken by a state, even not yet acknowledged by the northern powers, and with only four millions of inhabitants, excited the greatest surprise in Europe, and led to the greatest results which this grand project must necessarily produce—the independence of the nation and its internal welfare, its commerce and industry; the former being the principal aim and the promotion of commerce and industry a subordinate one, although the great mass of the people were unable to comprehend the grand idea of the plan.

"King Leopold found in his former minister of public works, Mr. De Theux, and in his successor, Mr. Notherm, vigorous supporters. The engineers were surveying in the swift prosecution of the work, and in four years more has been done than was expected. The enlightened minister Notherm published annual reports to the legislative assembly, besides other special reports of the progress of the works, in which the public in Europe find a rich source of experience, not to be met with in any report or work on the subject. Europe has to render thanks to the king who first realized such a grand idea, and to his enlightened minister, who judiciously conducted the work, and so liberally communicated its results."

The whole length of the Belgian rail road, now completed, is 159 English miles. Successive parts of this connected line have been opened for public use from time to time, from May, 1835, to August, 1838. The cost of these works, including buildings, locomotives, &c. was $34,000,000, which is equal to a cost of 41,300 dollars per mile. The rail road from Brussels to Antwerp—twenty-seven miles—consists of a double track. The rest are single, and the rail is of a weight of 45 lbs. per yard. Additional buildings are yet to be erected, and additional locomotives and cars provided, which will probably swell the cost to an average of 45,000 dollars per mile.

The rates of fare on the Belgian rail roads are much lower than on those of England or this country. There are classes of passenger cars, all moving in the same train, but differing in the degree of comfort to the travellers. The rate of fare in each of these classes is as follows: for each passenger, with 44 lbs. of baggage is as follows. In berlines 2 1-3 cents; diligences 2 cents; charrs a banes, 1 1-3 cents; wagons 4-5 of a cent; for soldiers, only half price is paid. The trains perform at an average rate of 17 English miles per hour, including all stops—and from 20 to 25 miles running time. The fare per mile, in the three classes of cars on the Liverpool and Manchester rail road is 5 cents 4 3-4 cents and 3 cents.

The number of passengers in 1837, was 1,384,577, and in 1838, including 56,615 travellers, 2,235,203. The average distance travelled by each passenger in 1837 was 17 miles, and in 1838, 23 miles. The gross income of 1838 was 3,100,833 francs. The gross income of 1837 was 3,100,833 francs, for over 581,770 dollars, including 162,915 francs for over five million of baggage and freight.

The expenses of the first ten months of 1838, amounted to 1,619,189 francs. Nearly half the whole length of rail road, viz: 70 miles was opened only at different periods of the year 1838. It is estimated that the income of 1839 will be equal to 5,088,000 francs, and the net income 1,700,000 francs, which is equal to 5 per cent. on the cost expended—an amount sufficient in that country to cover the interest, and a sinking fund of one per cent.

After giving a mass of other facts, and calculations in relation to the Belgian rail roads, Mr. de Gerstner proceeds to give the following.

Comparison of the Belgian rail roads with those in the United States.

According to table under No. 3, the number of passengers during 3 1-2 years, reduced for the length of one mile, amounted on the Belgian rail road to 25,423,361. Or at an average rate of road of 25,423,361. As the average length of road in 1837 was 53.1 miles, we have now the following comparison: The whole length of road is nearly 500,000 passengers per year. We have now the following comparison:

Cost of construction.—A mile of rail road with a single track, and the necessary buildings and outfit, costs in America 20,000 dollars; in Belgium 41,300 dollars, or more than twice the amount.

Tariff.—On the American rail roads, a passenger pays at an average 5 cents per mile; on the Belgian rail roads, only 1 cent or five times less, freight the charge is, in America, at an average 7 1/2 cents per ton per mile.

Speed.—On the American rail roads, passengers are conveyed with a speed of from 12 to 15 miles per hour, stoppages included; on the Belgian roads at the rate of 17 miles, or stoppages not included, at the rate of from 20 to 25 miles.

Traffic.—There are at an average, 35,000 through passengers, and 15,000 tons of goods carried annually on the American roads; on the Belgian there have been carried per year 478,783 through passengers, and the transportation of goods only commenced a short time since.

Gross income.—The same amounts on the American rail roads, at an average per mile and per year,

For 35,000 passengers, at 5 cents,	$1,750
For 15,000 tons of goods at 7 1/2 cts.	1,125
For mail and contingencies,	200

Total, $3,075

On the Belgian rail roads the gross income per mile from 478,783 passengers, and the transportation of freight amounts to 32,000 francs, or 6,003 dollars 75 cents per year.

Expenses per mile of travel.—These amount on the American rail roads to 1 dollar, on the Belgian roads to 1 dollar 5 cents, or they are the same in both countries.

Number of passengers per trip.—In Belgium there were in each train, at an average of 3 1/2 years, 143 through passengers; on the American roads, a passenger train contains only 40 through passengers, at an average.

Number of trips per year.—In dividing 35,000 by 40 we obtain 875, as the average number of passenger trip per year on the American rail roads; and in dividing 478,783 by 143 we get 3,348, which represents the average number of passenger trains passing annually over the Belgian roads. As at the same time the speed on the latter is greater than on the American rail roads, it was necessary to employ rails of 45 lbs. per yard, while their weight is generally less on the American rail roads.

Expenses per passenger per mile.—These are in Belgium only 0.75 cents, and in America 2 1/2 cents, or 2 1/2 times more. The reason of it is, that on the American trains contain 3 1/2 times less passengers, while the expenses per train per mile are equal in both countries. It is very nearly the same for a locomotive to carry 40 or 143 passengers in a train.

Annual current expenses.—In America the annual current expenses for working a rail road, are per mile,

For transportation of 35,000 passengers, at 2 1/2 cents,	$875
For transportation of 15,000 tons of goods, at 6 1/2 cents,	975
For transportation of the mail and other expenses,	100

Or 63 dollars 41 cents of every 100 dollars gross income. On the Belgian rail roads, of every 100 dollars gross revenue, the expenses are 65 dollars 59 cents, or per year per mile 3,937 dollars 86 cents.

Interest on the capital invested.—In America the annual average gross income, per mile of road, amounts to 3,075 dollars, the annual current expenses to 1,950, leaving 1,125 dollars, which, compared with the cost of a mile of road, (20,000 dollars) give 5 1/2 per cent. interest. On the rail roads in Belgium, the annual gross income per mile, is 6,003 dollars 75 cents, the expenses 3,937 dollars 86 cents, leaving 2,065 dollars 89 cents as interest on the cost of 41,300 dollars per mile, or exactly 5 per cent.

UNIFORM PENNY POSTAGE.

Rowland Hill has offered the following facts in favor of the system of penny postage, recommended by him to the British government.

Facts and estimates as to the increase of letters.

The only point connected with a uniform penny postage on which there appears to be any material difference of opinion is, as to whether or not the revenue will suffer by the proposed reduction.

The plan will stimulate the increase of letters in two ways—first, by the increased facilities of despatch of letters; second by the reduction of postage.

Increased facilities.

Many facts were proved in evidence before the postage committee, which renders it clear that even at the same or higher rates of postage, increasing the opportunities of despatching letters, and the rapidity with which they are transmitted and delivered always increase the number sent.

I. Palmer's adoption of mail coaches, though accompanied with repeated advances of postage, increased the number of letters threefold in twenty years. And

2. The new facilities of transmission afforded by the Manchester and Liverpool post way increased the number of letters between the termini nearly 50 per cent. in six years, postage remaining the same.

3. Although not substantiated before the postage committee, it is understood that the recent establishment of a morning mail from London to Brighton has produced a similar effect.

4. It appears from the valuable work of M. Piron, Soins Directeur des Postes aux Lettres, that a reduction in the time of transmission from Paris to Marseilles, from 118 to 68 hours, has doubled the number of letters.

Reduction of postage.

This is relied upon as by far the most efficient cause of increase in the number of letters.

It has been found that the decrease of price in any article of general demand, so far from lessening the amount of the public expenditure on such article, has always increased it.

"1. The price of soap, for instance, has recently fallen by about one-eighth; the consumption in the same time has increased by one-third. Tea, again, the price of which, since the opening of the China trade, has fallen about one-sixth, has increased in consumption by almost a half. The consumption of silk goods, which subsequently to the year 1823 have fallen in price by about one-fifth, has more than doubled. The consumption of coffee, the price of which, subsequently to 1823, has fallen about one-fourth, has more than tripled. And the consumption of cotton goods, the prices of which, during the last twenty years, has fallen by nearly one-half, has in the same time been fourfold."

2. The sale of newspapers for the 12 months before the late reduction in stamps was "35,376,056" at an average price, say 7d. costing the public 1,037,634 pounds."

For the 12 months subsequent to the reduction, it was 53,496,207,* at an average price, say of 4 1/2d. costing the public 1,058,779 pounds."

3. The annual number of advertisements before the late reduction in the advertisement duty was "1,010,000," at an average price, say of 6s. costing the public 303,000 pounds."

It is now "1,670,000," at an average price, say 4s. costing the public 334,000 pounds."

4. The number of persons paying for admission to the tower was in the 10 months prior to the late reduction, "9,508, at 3s. each (including the warder's fee)=1,426 pounds."

In the 10 months subsequent to the reduction it was "37,431, at 1s. each=1,871 pounds."

The rule established by these facts—viz: that the demand for the article increases in a greater proportion than the price decreases, so that if 1,000 are sold at 6d. is, it is believed, without exception—Certainly the article of postage does not furnish one.

"The reduction of the Irish postage rates which was made in 1837, was immediately followed by a considerable increase in the Irish post office revenue, though precisely to what extent it would be difficult to state, owing to a transfer that was made at the same time of certain receipts from the English to the Irish post office revenue. An alteration was made in the year 1831, which was equivalent to a partial reduction, by exempting the correspondence of a portion of the metropolis, which had paid the general post rate, from paying an additional two penny post rate. Consequent on this reduction, though at first attended with some loss, the post office revenue was improved to the amount of 10,000 pounds a year, instead of their being a loss of 20,000 pounds a year, as had been expected by the post office. A reduction made in 1835 on the rates of ship letters has been followed by a considerable increase in that branch of the revenue."† Third report of the select committee on postage, page 29.

Practical effect of reduction to one penny.

The postage of letters between Edinburgh and the adjacent towns and villages was, in 1837, reduced from 2d. to 1d. In rather more than a year the letters had more than doubled, and were on the increase when the last returns were made.‡

Postage between Stroud and Nailsworth, in Gloucestershire was recently reduced from 4d. to

*No. 367, session 1833.

†No. 184, session 1839.

‡The increase has been from £84,000 to 116,000 per annum. Vide "first report on postage," page 472.

§Third report, abstract page 24.

1d. The number of letters has already increased about sixfold.

Future gross revenue of the post office.

There seems, then, no rational ground of fear that the gross revenue of the post office will be diminished.

On the contrary, its increase might be safely predicted, even if no other change was contemplated than the proposed reduction. But taking the proposed additional facilities for the despatch of letters into account, the increase of the gross revenue may, at no distant period, be fairly expected to be considerable. Many persons competent to form a sound opinion, think such increase will be very large.

Future expenses of the post office.

The proposed changes will operate partly to increase, and partly to decrease, the cost of the post office.

The increase will arise out of the additional number of letters passing through the post.

The decrease, chiefly from the postage being paid in advance by means of stamps.

The balance will probably be a comparatively slight augmentation of expense, which it is confidently expected will be more than compensated by the increase in the customs, excise, &c. produced by the stimulus to commerce consequent on the cheapness of postage.

There is, then, no just reason for believing that the proposed reduction in postage will at all diminish the revenue of the country.

Below I have drawn out an estimate of the course which things may probably take after the proposed change, on the supposition of the gross revenue remaining the same as at present. I have perhaps undervalued some sources of increase, and overestimated others. I do not place much reliance on the details, but I have great confidence that the general result will hereafter be found below the truth.

Estimate of the mode in which the required increase of general post letters may be presumed to take place.

From the present letter writing class.

Present number of chargeable general post letters, calls this 1
 Contraband letters, and evasions by writing in newspapers, &c. (estimated by many at double the posted letters, but considered it equal only) 1

Total of letters now written 2
 Assume the rate of increase to be only 2 to 1 2

Estimated return general post letters, from the present letter writing class 4
 Invoices—(Estimated by Mr. Cobden, and other mercantile men, as equal to the present post letter—say half only) 1/2
 Additional printed circulars, catalogues, small parcels, &c. say 1/2
 Letters from numerous classes who may now be said not to use the post office at all, say 1/2

Required increase of general post letters to sustain the general revenue, (vide third report, p. 55) 6
 That is to say an addition of five-fold.

INTERESTING BILL OF MORTALITY.

From the New York Courier.

From a statistical report appended to the annual return of the coroner, of New York city, Ira B. Wheeler, esq. for the year ending December 31, 1838, we are enabled to glean the following interesting particulars:

Total number of inquests for the year, of which, in January, there were	42	July,	96

February,	29	August,	61
March,	34	September,	49
April,	37	October,	45

FRONTIER INCIDENTS.

From the Boston Mercantile Journal.

An occurrence took place near fort Winnebago, in the Wisconsin territory, a short time since, which was near involving two powerful tribes in an exterminating warfare, and will serve to illustrate some points in the Indian character.

The lands of the Menominees adjoin those of the Winnebagos, and these tribes have for years always lived not only in peace, but in bonds of friendship and intimacy with each other. It happened early in May last, that a Menominee, in a drunken frolic, stabbed a Winnebago, and, what was considered extraordinary, was suffered to remain for some hours afterwards in the Winnebago camp, and departed without molestation. In the course of a week or two after this transaction, Yellow Thunder, a Winnebago chief of a warlike character, called at fort Winnebago, and in an interview with major W. V. Cobbs, who commanded that post, narrated the occurrence, and stated that he had been selected by his people to avenge the murder. He had accordingly taken with him a band of warriors, and it was his intention to carry death and desolation into the Menominee country. His plans appeared to be formed with judgment and skill. The Menominees at that time resided in several villages, at some distance from each other, and the design of Yellow Thunder was to fall upon the unsuspecting Menominees in each village successively, cut them off in detail, and thus exterminate this powerful and warlike tribe.

Major Cobbs, who, by long and familiar intercourse with the Indians, was well acquainted with their character, took prompt and decided, yet prudent measures for preventing this sanguinary design of Yellow Thunder from being carried into effect. He had a long talk with him, attempted to show him not only the impropriety and injustice of such a proceeding, but its impolicy, and expatiated on the evil consequences to his people which would result from open hostilities with the whites, which would inevitably be the case provided his intentions were carried into effect. At length he so far prevailed upon Yellow Thunder as to induce him to postpone the execution of his projects of revenge until attempts to settle it by other means had failed. He immediately sent an express to the head chief of the Menominees, who was then sixty miles off, informing him of the occurrence, and requesting his presence immediately at the fort. And in a few days, the Menominee chief appeared at fort Winnebago, attended by sixty-five of the chiefs and principal warriors of his nation, completely armed, and encamped near the Winnebagos, under the guns of the fort.

Major Cobbs assured both parties that, if either band commenced hostilities, he should open his batteries upon the aggressor without ceremony, and set himself to work in good earnest to heal the difficulties between them. He was at that time suffering from severe indisposition, but he was so fully aware of the importance of adopting prompt and decided measures, if he would prevent a sanguinary war, that he caused himself to be carried to the place of council, between the two encampments, where he conferred with the chiefs, sometimes with one, sometimes with both together, for several days—using all his powers to induce the tribes to bury the tomahawk.

The chief of the Winnebagos was at the outset furious for war, and would not patiently listen to any proposals for peace. One of the warriors of his tribe had been basely murdered, and a dreadful vengeance must follow. On the other hand, the chief of the Menominees was, from the commencement, anxious for a continuance of peace. He regretted the unhappy circumstance which had excited the angry and revengeful feelings of the Winnebagos, but was unwilling to surrender the offender, (his nephew) to the vengeance of his foes. He said that if the Winnebagos had killed him on the spot, when he had perpetrated the crime of which he was accused, they would have acted right, and in accordance with Indian customs, and he would not have complained; but, after suffering such an opportunity for immediate revenge to escape, they had no right to insist upon having the offender placed in their hands. For the sake of peace, however, he was willing to make some valuable presents to the Winnebagos, which he hoped would have the effect of disarming them of their resentment.

It was with much difficulty that major Cobbs could get the Winnebagos to listen to any overtures of a compromise of this kind. But it happened, fortunately, that a case of a similar kind had occurred a few years before. Life had been taken in a drunken frolic, and the offender had been induced to forego their revenge by a rich display of valuable presents. This precedent was urged with much force by the commanding officer of the fort, and the time was appointed when the final determination of the parties was to be made known.

The major was carried in his chair to the place of meeting. The Winnebago chiefs were on one side of him, and the Menominees on the other. He made them an harangue, in which he repeated all his arguments in favor of a peaceable termination of their difficulties; and he strongly urged upon Yellow Thunder to accept the conditions offered by the Menominees. While he was speaking, the wife of the Winnebago who had been killed was sitting in front of the warriors, weeping bitterly, and sobbing as if overwhelmed with a dreadful calamity. When the major had finished his remarks, the chief of the Menominees arose, and made a speech, in which he deeply regretted the difficulty which had taken place, and showed his sincere desire for peace, and concluded by ordering presents, consisting of strings of wampum, furs, &c. to be brought forward, to the value of two or three hundred dollars, which he offered to the Winnebagos as a peace-offering.

A silence now ensued for a few moments, when the desolate widow arose from her recumbent posture, and with a firm step walked up to the warrior who had killed her husband, and who was standing near the principal chief; with a forgiving smile, she tendered him her hand, which he took and shook heartily; at the same instant the head chiefs advanced towards each other, and shook hands and the whole body of the Winnebagos and Menominees mingled with each other, renewing their former familiar intercourse, and exchanging congratulations on the peaceful termination of an affair which, at one time, threatened the most sanguinary results. The pipe of peace was then smoked, and the tomahawk was buried with the usual ceremony. The commanding officer of the post then retired within the fort, much pleased with the successful results of his attempts at pacification.

DEATH OF RIDGE.

Newton county, Mo. June 29, 1839.

MESSRS. EDITORS: A bloody tragedy has just been acted near the state line, in the Cherokee nation, which for brutality, almost beggars description, and which I give you an account as I have been able to learn.

On the 22d inst. about forty half and full blood Cherokee Indians came to the house of John Ridge, esq. a distinguished Cherokee, and just about day light entered the chamber of Mr. Ridge unperceived by any of the family, and burst a cap at his head, which awoke him, who then saw and left his impending fate, no doubt, and called on his assailants for mercy. Finding the instrument of death which they had presented, failed in its fatal purpose, they took him out of his bed, from beside his wife, carried him into the yard, and then butchered him in a most savage and brutal manner, by stabbing him in the body some twenty-seven times.— They then threw him up in the air as far as they could, and when his dying body reached the ground, each one stamped upon the body as they marched over it by single file, until the last man of them had performed his fiendish purpose. This tragedy was executed in the presence of his wife, children and servants. The shock to Mrs. Ridge was more than she could bear and she was seized with spasms, which threatens her life.

The party after killing Mr. John Ridge, took up the line of march in pursuit of major Ridge, the father of J. Ridge, who had the day before started with his servant, to visit some friends in Van Buren, Arkansas. Report reaches us that the party overtook major Ridge in the evening of the 22d, and killed him on his horse by shooting him. This report is doubtless true. It is also reported that his well known Elias Boudinot and col. Bell, and six other principal men of the Ridge party, have shared the same fate of the unfortunate John Ridge and his father. I entertain some doubts as to the deaths of those last mentioned persons—but it is altogether probable.

The cause which led to this melancholy event, has grown out of the dissatisfaction of perhaps a majority of the old Cherokee nation, in opposition to the treaty familiarly called the "Ridge treaty" and those other persons said to be killed are some of the most prominent men, who with the Ridges, and others, concluded the treaty with Mr. Schermerhorn and governor Carroll, a few years since, the history of which is well known to your readers.

The recent congregating of the whole nation, has endeavored at these old feuds, and they have now consummated the threats of killing Ridge for some time past made.

The friends of major Ridge and his son John Ridge, have, as I am informed, shown eternal vengeance against some of the head men of the nation of the other party. Where these travelties will end, time alone can unfold and determine. John Ridge was a gentleman of highly cultivated mind, having received a liberal education at one of the colleges in Connecticut, where he married a most respectable lady, a Miss Northrop of that state. Major Ridge and his son were both considered wealthy, and were extensively engaged in mercantile business.

Major Ridge was formerly one of the principal chiefs of his nation, and a commanded a battalion of his countrymen under general Jackson against the Creeks during the last war; and although unlettered was altogether a man of strong and discriminating mind. His intercourse with the intelligent and wealthy gave him the appearance of a wealthy southerner. He was kind and hospitable—was about sixty-five years of age.

John Ridge was about 37 years of age—he left a wife and six children. The death of the two Ridges, will long be regretted by their friends and acquaintances.

It is reported that the U. S. dragoons have been called to the scene of murder.

The intercourse with the whites and Cherokees passing to and fro, has not, as yet, been interrupted. Persons having business in the nation and at the forts, go as usual, though there is some severity at present manifested.

Should any thing further transpire worthy of notice, I will again write you. Your friend,
A SUBSCRIBER.

P. S. I saw a gentleman to-day, who confirms her report of the death of major Ridge. He was killed near the residence of Mr. Evans at the foot of Boston Mountain, about 35 miles from Van Buren, Arkansas. He was waylaid and shot from his horse. No further account as to Boudinot and col. ell.

A postscript in the Ozark Standard of the 9th, says:

We have just learned by a gentleman direct from Fayetteville, Ark. that the Ridge and Ross parties are increasing, and that already each party numbers two to three thousand warriors.

The Ridge party are represented as the most numerous, and as determined to revenge the death of their chiefs.

We learn also that gen. Arbuckle had sent two hundred dragoons to demand the murderers of Ridge, who was murdered within the limits of this state. Also, that he had ordered home the Creeks of Senecas who had joined the two hostile parties, who are said to have obeyed his order.

NAVAL PROWESS.

In Cooper's history of the navy, we find the following memorable cases of personal prowess, exhibited by two of our officers during the war with Tripoli:

"No sooner had Mr. Decatur got possession of the first assailed, than he took her in tow, and bore down on the one next to the leeward. Running the enemy aboard, as before, he went into him, with most of his officers and men. The captain of the Tripolitan vessel was a large, powerful man, and Mr. Decatur personally charged him with a pike. The weapon, however, was seized by the Turk, wrested from the hands of the assailant, and turned against its wner. The latter parried a thrust, and made a blow with his sword at the pike, with a view to cut off its head. The sword bit the iron, and broke at the hilt, and at the next moment the Turk made another rush. Nothing was left to the gallant Decatur, but his arm, with which he so far carried the blow as to seize the pike only through the flesh of his breast, pushing the iron from the wound, flesh and all, he sprang within the weapon, and grappled his antagonist. The pike fell between the two, and a short ail of strength succeeded, in which the Turk prevailed. As the combatants fell, however, Mr. Decatur so far released himself as to lie side by side with his foe on the deck.

"The Tripolitan now endeavored to reach his ship, while his hand was firmly held by that of a enemy. At this critical instant, when life or death depended on a moment well employed, or a moment lost, Mr. Decatur drew a small pistol from a pocket of his vest, passed the arm that was free under the body of the Turk, pointed the muzzle and then fired. The ball passed entirely through the body of the Mussulman, and lodged in the ribs of his foe. At the same instant Mr. Decatur felt the grasp that had almost smothered him lax, and he was liberated. He sprang up, and the Tripolitan lay dead at his feet. In such a melee it is not supposed that the struggle of the two adversaries would go unnoticed. An enemy raised his breast to cleave the skull of Mr. Decatur while he occupied by his enemy, and a young man of the uterprise's crew interposed an arm to save him. The blow was intercepted, but the limb was severed a bit of skin. A fresh rush was now made upon the enemy, who was overcome without much other resistance.

In the mean time, Mry Trippe, in No. 6, the last of three boats that was able to reach the weather division, was not idle. Reserving his fire, like the others he delivered it with deadly effect, when closing, and went on board his enemy in the smoke. In this instance the boats also separated by the shock of the collision, leaving Mr. Trippe, with Mr. J. D. Jeney, and nine men only on board the Tripolitan. Here too, the commanders seized each other, and a severe personal combat occurred, while the work of death was going on around them. The Turk was young, and of a large athletic form, and soon compelled his slighter but more active foe to fight with caution. Advancing on Mr. Trippe, he could strike a blow, and receive a thrust in return. In this manner, he gave the American commander less than eight score wounds in the head and two in the breast; when making a sudden rush, he struck ninth blow on the head, which brought Mr Trippe upon a knee. Rallying all his forces, in a desperate effort, the latter, who still retained the short pike which he fought, made a thrust that passed through his gigantic adversary, and imbedded him on his back. As soon as the Tripolitan officer fell, the remainder of his people submitted. The boat, taken by Trippe, was one of the largest belonging to the bastaw. The number of her men is not positively known, but living and dead, thirty-six were found in her, of whom twenty-one were either killed or wounded. When it is remembered that but eleven Americans boarded her, the achievement must past for one of the most gallant on record.

CRIMINAL OFFENCES.

From the New York Evening Post.

The late secretary of this state presented to the legislature, at its last session, an interesting report on convictions for criminal offences. It is accompanied by statistical tables embracing a variety of details, collected with great labor and skillfully digested. They relate chiefly to the increase of crime during the past few years, the nature of the offences which have been committed, the age and sex of persons charged with high misdemeanors and the criminal statistics of this state as compared with those of England and France.

During the year 1838 the number of convictions fell short of that of 1837 by one, whilst the diminution since 1833 is still greater. But the year is distinguished for offences against property. An unusually large number of these are of the most atrocious and violent character.

The proportion of crimes against the person, excluding cases of assault and battery to crimes against property, in 1833, was 1 to 8.50; and to all other crimes, including crimes against property, 1 to 12.10. The proportion of crimes against the person, including assault and battery, to crimes against property, was 1 to 1.96, and to all other crimes, including those against property, 1 to 2.66.

Although the whole number of convictions was 1,086, the number of persons convicted was but 1,035. Of this number, there were 973 males, 61 females; and one corporation indicted for nuisance. There were forty-seven crimes committed by males which were connected with offences of petit larceny.

The following table exhibits the proportion of crimes of the different classes committed by males and females, during the year 1835.

Crimes.	Males.	Females.	Proportion.
Against the person,	233	13	21.54 to 1
Against property,	536	45	11.92 to 1
Forgery and offence against the currency.	42	0	42 to 0
Other offences,	159	7	22.71 to 1
	1,021	62	15.70 to 1

Of the whole number of crimes committed by females, 37—more than half, were cases of larceny. Of the more heinous offences, four were committed by females, viz: one case of arson; one of poisoning, with intent to kill; one of attempting to poison; and one of assault, with intent to kill. There is no country, of the criminal statistics of which we have any knowledge, where the proportion of females charged or convicted of crimes, is so small as in this state. In England, in 1831, the proportion of males to females was 428 to 1; in France, in 1832, 469 to 1; and in this state, in 1838, as above shown, 1,570 to 1.

In the first report presented to the legislature relative to convictions for criminal offences, senate document of 1837, No. 62, a comparison was instituted, in respect to the prevalence of crime between this state and some of the principal countries in Europe. It was observed in that report, that it was extremely difficult to make a direct comparison between the tables of different countries, which should give an accurate view of the relative prevalence of crime within them, in consequence of the different classification of offences, and the differences which exist in the administration of their criminal laws. The justice of this observation, is strongly illustrated by a reference to the same report, to the comparative state of crime in England and Ireland, greatly to the disadvantage of the latter country. The comparison was founded on the tables prepared under the authority of the British government; and from this comparison it appeared, that there was in the year 1835, one conviction in England and Wales, to every 675 inhabitants, and in Ireland, one to every 377. It is to be observed, however, that the tables for Ireland include a large number of minor offences, which are tried before the inferior tribunals in England, and which are not embraced by the English tables, so that by comparing the whole number of convictions in the two countries, a very different result is obtained. Thus, in the year 1836, the whole number of convictions in England and Wales, was 1 to 212 inhabitants—whereas in Ireland, the whole number was 1 to 450. In this enumeration, are included summary convictions in both countries.—We have no means of making a similar comparison between this state and England, as the convictions before our inferior tribunals are not returned to this office. The convictions embraced by our tables may, perhaps, be fairly compared with the convictions at the quarter sessions and assizes in England and Wales. These convictions for 1836, amounted to 14,774, while the convictions in this state for 1838, were 1,056. Estimating the population of England and Wales at 14,000,000 in 1836, and the population of this state at 2,200,000 in 1838, and the following proportions result from the comparison in England and Wales, one conviction to every 943 inhabitants, and in this state, one to 2,025.

A greater difficulty exists in comparing the state of crimes in this state, with the condition of France in respect to crime. If the convictions in France before the courts of assize only, are admitted into the comparison, it would be greatly to our disadvantage, as a large number of offences are contained in our tables, which in France would be tried before the correctional tribunals. On the other hand, if all the convictions before the correctional tribunals were admitted into the comparison, it would be greatly to the disadvantage of France, as many of the offences are tried before them, which in this state are tried before the police courts, and are not included in our tables. Thus the condemnations in the courts of assize in France in 1832, were but 4,657, which to a population of 32,561,463, would give one condemnation or conviction to every 6,991 inhabitants. On the other hand, the convictions before the correctional tribunals, amounted to 190,440 which, added to the convictions in the courts of assize, would give one conviction to every 166 inhabitants. Of the latter, 166,000 were sentenced to imprisonment for one year or more, 27,524 for a less term than a year, and 156,791 were punished by fine.

The French tables of 1832, also show the number of convictions before the ordinary police courts, amounting to 122,695, of which 177,582, were punished by fine, and 5,113 by imprisonment. Most of these cases were simple violations of police regulations, among which are those which relate to the public safety and health, as obstructing the highways, racing horses in the interior of inhabited places, selling adulterated liquors and unwholesome food. Among them, however, are cases of riot and other offences, which are tried by our higher courts, and which are included in our tables. If the European tables were accompanied with some description of the courts, before which offences are tried, the extent of their jurisdiction, with a tariff of penalties, like that contained in the annexed table unsketched, a more accurate comparison might be instituted between the different countries of Europe, in respect to the state of crime within them as well as between those countries and this state.

It must be manifest from the foregoing facts and statements, that it is only in respect to crimes of the most atrocious character, that a comparison can be instituted, with any chance of obtaining a fair result; and that a direct comparison between the tables of different countries, will almost always be open to the hazard of running out deceptive parallels. The comparison made in the last annual report on convictions between this state and England, were so full, that it is unnecessary to repeat them. At the time that report was made, the secretary of state had not been able to obtain the French tables. If, since that time, procured those for 1832; and, if it may not be interesting to compare France and the state of New York, in respect to a crime of the highest degree of atrocity against the person, as the comparison can now be made on authentic data, Convictions for	In France, in 1832.	In New York, in 1833.

Murder,	257	4
Do. attempts to commit,		19
Rape,	121	7
Do. assaults with intent to commit,		7
Infanticide,	43
Total,	561	37

In the total number of convictions for murder in France, cases of assassination, parricide, and poisoning are included; and in the total number in this state, cases of poisoning and attempting to poison, and assaults with intent to kill are included. Even this comparison is not made on exact terms of equality. The French tables show the number of accusations, and the number of acquittals and convictions; so that under the head of murder, attempts to kill will be found. In like manner, assaults with intent to commit rape, are doubtless placed under the head of rape. In our tables they are separated. On the other hand, under the head of "blesures et coups," in the French tables, there are 39 cases of wounds, which resulted in the death of the wounded persons, and 73 cases in which they were left in a state incapacitating them for labor.

Such cases, in this state, would be tried in the higher courts, and classed under higher denominations of crime. The population of France, in 1822, was, as has been already stated $2,551,463 souls. Estimating the population of this state, in 1835, at 2,200,000; and a comparison of the two countries in respect to the crimes stated in the above table will give for France 1 to every 59,041 inhabitants; and in this state 1 to every 59,459 inhabitants. The proportion of these crimes for the year 1838 in this state was, however, unusually large so that the comparison is between a very unfavorable year in this state, with a year in France, which does not as is believed, exceed the average of other years. If the comparison be between both countries in 1832, it will give in France 1 conviction to every 59,041 inhabitants; and in this state 1 to every 125,000.

It deserves to be considered, that of the four cases of murder committed in this state in the year 1835, two were by negroes, and one by a Canadian, who had been but a short period in the state. In an able work of Mr. Queseteau, on man, referred to in last year's report, the race or origin of the convicted person is deemed an essential ingredient in the statistics of crime. In the table here, being a mixed population, and attracting to it, commercial importance large numbers of persons from other countries, it is of great consequence that our tables should show to what extent crimes are committed by those who have recently become inhabitants of the state, or who are temporarily sojourning in it. As was stated in last year's report, our tables are exceedingly defective in other respects also. They do not show the ages of the convicted persons, their habits, or the degree of instruction which they have received. If the county clerks were required to furnish such information as should be called for by the secretary of state, complete tables could be prepared with but little trouble, and with no additional expense, excepting that of printing blanks.

By the table marked E, it will be perceived that the only cases, in which sentence of death was pronounced, were the four cases of murder. Three of the persons convicted of this crime were executed in pursuance of their sentence, and the fourth is in the state prison at Sing Sing, his sentence having been commuted by the governor for imprisonment for life.

BRITISH PARLIAMENT.

AFFAIRS OF CANADA.

In the house of commons, July 4, the second reading of the Canada government bill being moved by lord John Russell,

Sir G. Sinclair commented with severity on the vacillating and dilatory course of ministers, and protested against their remaining in office, conscious as they must be that they had not the confidence of Great Britain, or of her dependencies, and that no measure emanating from them could be received with respect or cordiality.

Mr. Home regretted the determination of ministers not to follow the recommendations of lord Durham. He urged ministers to re-establish local governments, and let the colonists know what ground they were standing on.

Mr. O'Connell vindicated the course of ministers. He thought they did right to pause and deliberate before they adopted final proceedings. He rejoiced to find that they did not intend to pledge the house to a union between the upper and lower provinces. The materials for such a union were most discordant, and such a union must press unjustly on some considerable portion of the people. Upper Canada would not consent to such a union except on terms favorable to the interests of that province, which must be most disadvantageous to the inhabitants of the lower province. He had seen with deep regret this recommendation of a union in the otherwise admirable report of lord Durham. It would annihilate the powers of the French Canadians. The French Canadians had been described in that report as kind, benevolent, charitable, excellent persons; exemplary in the performance of their duties; free from vice, which was almost unknown among them, and that what was the result of this eulogium? Why, that it was proposed to annihilate them as a people. No reason was given for this.

If any thing were done to deprive them of their fair share in the franchise, [cheers], they would only increase the existing discontent; in fact, they would be giving them a legitimate ground for discontent, and instead of ending the controversies at present existing in the colony, it would only tend to render them perpetual. [Hear, hear.] It was a fact that in the executive council of Canada there was not a single born native of the colony. Every one of them had been born in some part of Great Britain. Of the legislative council four out of five were British subjects. How was it possible, then, to conciliate the natives if they were thus excluded from all power and authority? It must be productive of jobbing and dissatisfaction in the minds of the Canadians. It appeared to him extremely doubtful whether it was possible to conciliate that colony, but they could never do so, so long as they proceeded upon the principle of annihilating the French Canadians, and giving political superiority to a race that had no pretensions to it. He would conclude by expressing his gratification that the government had not pledged the house to any bill of the kind for the present session. [Hear.]

Mr. Charles Buller disapproved of the course adopted. He thought the government should take care that no news left England without its being known what was to be done with the colonies.

In his opinion it was the most grievous thing that could be conceived to leave a country in perpetual doubt as to what was to be done for them. There was a general belief growing up in Canada that the interests of that colony were utterly neglected, and they had no right to think so, when, month after month an session after session passed away without any thing being done. From his knowledge of the colonies he could assure the government that the success of the measure rested with themselves; if the people found that they were prepared to carry out the union with bona fides, all parties in the colonies would rally round them, for they wanted a good and strong government. The troubles in Canada had arisen because of the uncertainty in which the people had been kept, as for the last ten years the policy of all governments had been vacillating. He fully believed such was the opinion of the people, that it would be very easy to carry out the large plan of union suggested and recommended by lord Durham, and that with the consent of the whole of the legislatures.

There was one warning which he wished to give the noble lord. If he meant not to adopt the union of the two provinces, let him say so at once; but, if the noble lord wished to have it adopted, he was taking a strange course to get the public feeling in favor of it. In the first place, the government seemed anxious that there should be no discussion during the present session; and next, all the information they had given the house was, that objections existed in Upper Canada to the union. The noble lord had laid on the table of the house a report from the committee of assembly of Upper Canada, impugning some parts of lord Durham's report, and also some despatches from sir George Arthur, complaining of other parts of it.

If the noble lord was anxious that the union should be carried, he might have given evidence in favor of the union as well as against it. [Hear.] The noble lord had given no information as to the mode in which the report of the committee of assembly was adopted—that the session was to have been adjourned on that day—that it was kept back till the day on which it was to be carried, and was kept sitting till the Saturday—and that when one-third of the reforming members had gone home, this report was carried, and the clergy reserve bill proposed and carried by one vote. Since the report arrived here, there had been two elections in Canada, and those candidates who were in favor of lord Durham's report for the union carried their elections by a very large majority.

There was one thing in the despatches of sir G. Arthur which especially ought to have made the government very cautious in laying them upon the table. Sir G. Arthur had referred to what he considered the unfavorable opinion which had been expressed by lord Durham as to the execution of two individuals. Now, if the government had looked to the report of lord Durham, there was nothing in it at all justifying the reference to such a subject for all that lord Durham had said was, that the execution of these men had increased the irritation of the public mind, and, certainly, hanging people was not likely to produce conciliation. Most of the facts stated by sir G. Arthur, were utterly and monstrously untrue.

He (Mr. B.) did not mean to say any thing personally offensive, because he did not think that sir G. Arthur stated these facts knowing them to be false, but he should have inquired, and then he would have been convinced that they were not true; and he was guilty of great carelessness in having without inquiry, stated such things. One circumstance he (Mr. B.) would relate to the house. Sir G. Arthur had accused lord Durham of incorrectly stating the number of signatures to petitions in favor of the two individuals referred to as 30,000, allowing them to be only 5,000. Now, a gentleman from Upper Canada had called upon him (Mr. B.) and informed him that he had presented sir G. Arthur with one petition alone, the signatures of which were more numerous than all those which he had acknowledged. What credit, therefore, could be attached to his statements.

Mr. Leader protested against the union of the provinces, or any plan which would have the effect of crushing or annihilating the French Canadians, or of compelling them to sacrifice their feelings, their laws, their language, or their religion.

Lord John Russell was of opinion that a union between the provinces was the principle on which the affairs ought to be finally settled. In the mean while they ought to furnish the temporary government with the power of encouraging public undertakings, and also securing emigration.

After some further remarks, the bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on the 11th.

AMERICAN SLAVERS.

From the Commercial Advertiser.

We have a volume of official documents, printed by order of the British parliament, and containing, in part, the correspondence of the British government and its diplomatic and other officers, upon the subject of the slave trade—including, also, portions of correspondence with other governments—between the 2d of February and the 3rd of May of the present year. A portion of the volume is devoted to the United States, and of this we lay before our readers an abstract:

The first letter is from lord Palmerston to Mr. Fox, enclosing one from commander Kellett, of H. B. M. brig Brisk, to rear-admiral Elliott, informing him that in July, 1837, he had boarded the schooner Africa, under the American flag, on the coast of Africa, under the American flag, but having on board nine passengers, Spaniards and Portuguese, with a Spaniard as supercargo, and consigned to a notorious slave trader at the Gallinas. Commander Kellett had no doubt that the brig had Portuguese papers, but, as she was under the American flag, he did not feel justified in making search for them.

Next follows a despatch from lord Palmerston to Mr. Fox, enclosing a report from H. B. majesty's commissioners at Havana, by which it appears that no less than 19 American vessels were engaged, in the year 1838, in carrying on the Cuba slave trade.

Then a despatch from lord Palmerston to Mr. Fox, dated March 22, 1839, including papers received at the admiralty, showing that the American consul at Havana (Mr. Trist) had affixed his name to the papers of vessels about to be employed in the slave trade, and had also signed blank forms, to be filled up at pleasure by the persons in command of those vessels.

The papers referred to are—

1. A despatch from rear admiral Elliott, commander-in-chief on the African station, to the lord commissioners of the admiralty.

2. A letter from commander Kellett to rear admiral Elliott, dated Sierra Leone, August 8, 1837, stating that he had boarded the Portuguese schooner Senhora de Bon Vigem, from Havana, and found her papers signed by the American consul at Havana, with the reason assigned therefor, that there was no Portuguese consul at that port.

3. A list of vessels engaged in the slave trade, which had been searched and detained by British vessels on the African station, between October 1 and December 31st, 1838. Among these vessels was the schooner Constitucio, under Portuguese colors, from Havana, with papers signed by Mr. Trist, and also blank papers signed by him, to fill up as occasion might require. She had slaves on board, and also irons, plank for slave deck covers, and other slaving equipments.

Then comes a letter from lord Palmerston to Mr. Fox, with enclosures, the principal of which are:

1. A letter from lieutenant com. Birch, of H. B. M. brig Wizard, dated off Bahia, 12th November, 1833 to commodore Sullivan, stating that on the 16th September he had boarded the schooner Eagle, Baltimore, under American colors and papers. Lieut. Birch, therefore, did not think himself justified in searching her, although it was alleged that she had landed slaves to the northward of Bahia on the 19th of October, she sailed 1833.

2. Another letter from lieutenant com. Birch to commodore Sullivan, dated as the former, stating that the American brig Dido, of Baltimore, Phillips' master, left Havana in March, 1837, with a gentleman, whose name was not stated, and a Portuguese slave cargo touched at the usual port, and was afterwards, and Portuguese papers were obtained there proceeded to the Bight of Benin, and on board five hundred and seventy-five slaves, which she sailed for Bahia. On hearing that point it was seen that U. B. M. sloop of war Sparrowhawk was lying there, upon which the Dido haul off, hoisting American colors. The same evening the slaves were landed, the brig put to rights, and the next day she came into the harbor of Bahia under American colors. There was a Portuguese amed Manuel, on board, who figured as supercargo when the brig was under American colors, and a master when under Portuguese; Phillips, the American master, then representing himself as supercargo. The Dido was under Portuguese colors on the coast of Africa—under American at Bahia. She sailed again for the coast of Africa on the 27th of July. One of her crew, James Fox, subsequently entered on board the Wizard, and declared his readiness to make oath to the facts above stated. He had seventy-five dollars a month as wages, and one hundred dollars bounty when the slaves were landed.

3. Another letter from lieutenant com. Birch to Commodore Sullivan, dated on board the Wizard, off Bahia, December 20, 1838, stating that on the 10th he boarded the schooner Mary Lushington, of Baltimore. Reynolds' master, under American colors, with a Spanish and Portuguese crew, from the coast of Africa, bound for Bahia. It was well known at Bahia that she had been sold at Havana for the slave trade, retaining her American papers and master. She had been to the coast of Africa for slaves, but was there so closely watched by one of the British cruisers that, after a stay of some weeks, she attempted to get slaves on board was given up, and she sailed for Bahia in ballast. She was shortly to sail again for Africa.

The master observed to the boarding officer that, if there had been slaves on board, he would not have seen the American colors up.

Then follow two letters from Lord Palmerston to Mr. Fox, instructing him to call the attention of the United States government to the conduct of Mr. Trist, in officiating as Portuguese consul at Havana, and to urge the necessity either of entering into some convention by which British cruisers should be enabled to capture slaving vessels under the American flag, or of stationing American vessels of war on the coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave trade under that flag.

Next comes a letter from sir John Barrow, enclosing six others.

1st. From lieutenant Reeve, of H. B. M. sloop of war Lily, announcing the capture of the American brig Eagle, sailing under American colors, but with a Spanish crew, and her release by the court at Sierra Leone, because her papers were American. When captured she was last from Havana, and was believed to be the same vessel formerly reported to the admiralty under the name of the Tres Amigos, under Portuguese colors, and employed in the slave trade. She was sold at Havana, and Mr. Trist attested the sale, and granted American papers. Three other vessels had been captured and released, under the same circumstances, one of which was subsequently recaptured with slaves on board. Lieutenant Reeve concludes his letter by saying—"no other flag but the American will be seen on the coast in a short time, for it affords all the protection a slaver requires under the existing laws."

2d. From rear admiral Elliott to Mr. Wood; from which the following are extracts:

"Several of the slave dealers have declared their intention to have an American sailing master in each vessel, and American colors; and some have had the impudence to assert that the government of the United States would not discountenance such practices by any act or agreement which could prevent such gross abuse of the American flag."

"The probable object of using the American flag will be to protect the vessels up to the time of the cargo being ready for shipment, then to go through the ruse of selling the vessels to the Portuguese or Spaniards. But in case of capture with slaves on board under the American flag, it should be known what is to be done with the man passing for the American captain."

"The actual sale of nearly all the slave vessels in question takes place at Havana, where one man is engaged to personify an American captain; but they seem very indifferent as to having any pretended American papers. The mere flag, in their opinion, is sufficient, and as they are also provided with proper national flags, they are prepared in case of meeting with an American vessel of war."

3d. A letter from lieutenant Killeit to rear admiral Elliott, dated on board H. B. M. brig Bisk, Sierra Leone, October 29, 1838, announcing the capture of the schooner Mary Ann Cassard, under American colors. She belonged to Gilbert Cassard, of Baltimore, and had been sold at Matanzas. She had no American papers but the roll, which was signed by the United States consul at Matanzas. The crew consisted of twenty-four men, the master was an Englishman but called himself an American.

4th. From lieutenant Killeit to the same, calling attention to the case of the American schooner, Mary Hopper, above stated. She had Portuguese and American papers—the latter to be used if overhauled by a British, the former if by an American vessel of war.

4. From captain Popham, of the sloop of war Pelican, mentioning the case of the ship Venus of Baltimore, an exceedingly fast sailer, which arrived at Lagos from Boston, on the 5th of November, 1838, took in a large cargo of slaves, said to amount to 1,150, being protected by the American flag and papers while taking the slaves on board, and hoisting the Portuguese flag when she sailed. The Pelican chased, but could not overtake her.

At Lagos the Pelican boarded a large American brigantine, discharging a cargo for the purchase of slaves.

Subsequently the Pelican boarded a Portuguese slave schooner, on board which was an American named Huntington, who had sold the American schooner Ontario to a Spaniard at Brass, and was going home. The Ontario was protected by the American flag, but was subsequently captured by the Pelican, being then under Spanish colors, with 220 slaves on board. She had no papers. The letter concludes as follows:

"It has been stated by Spaniards and Portuguese slaving on this coast, that, were it not for the active co-operation of the Americans, the slave trade would materially decline. I do not doubt, from all I hear, that the citizens of the United States (generally of Baltimore) are more deeply interested in the slave trade to Havana and Brazil than is generally supposed."

5. Extract of a letter from rear admiral Elliott to Mr. Wood, dated February 13, 1839:

"Of American flags used for this purpose, there are more than twice as many at present on the coast; and in so bare-faced a manner do they proceed, that some have not even one American to personify the captain, but satisfy themselves with furnishing one of the crew with a certificate of naturalization for the occasion. If her majesty's ships were at liberty to send some of these pretended Americans to the United States, and the government of that country were to uphold the honor of their flag, by subjecting such lawless felons to prosecution and punishment, it is not to be doubted that the nefarious usurpations of their flag by the most notorious slave dealers belonging to Spain and Portugal."

6. Letter from lieutenant Hall to rear admiral Elliott, stating that on the 23d day of January, 1839, he boarded a fast new Baltimore schooner, in ballast, evidently intended for the slave trade. Crew Spanish, the captain a Frenchman, naturalized a citizen of the United States. American papers.

RECEPTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

From the New York Evening Post.

THE PRESIDENT AT HOME.

Mr. Van Buren was received on Friday, at the city of Hudson by his fellow citizens of Columbia county with the warmest and most gratifying tokens of personal and public regard. With the respect which was felt towards him as the firm and dauntless supporter of democratic principles, in times which put his consistency to the severest test, was blended the attachment of old neighborhood, the feeling of personal friendship, and the kindly recollection of his private virtues. The discourtesy of the municipal authorities of Hudson, who do not satisfy the public mind to offer him the usual invitation to visit their city, adopted an offensive preamble and resolution, which were promulgated, with a view of lessening the cordiality of Mr. Van Buren's reception in his native county, had a different effect from what was intended. An immense concourse of people, inhabitants of Hudson and other parts of the county, assembled to greet his arrival—the toils of husbandry, even at this season of great agricultural activity, were intermitted, and the streets of Hudson were thronged as they were never thronged before. The New Era of this morning contains an account of the proceedings, by an eye witness, from which we extract the following:

"About one o'clock, the Albany republican artillery accompanied by about an hundred citizens, arrived, and at the same time, the roar of the artillery announced that the president and his escort had arrived. Soon the procession approached. First came col. Darling, chief marshal, and his aids; then his mounted escort, consisting of about 200 young men, with blue and white scarfs; the Albany republican artillery next, then the president in a barouche, accompanied by Messrs. Wiswall, Anable and Woodcut of the committee of arrangements; the committee of arrangements in carriages—a large concourse of citizens on foot, and then an array of carriages and wagons which seemed interminable, as it wound down the hill which overlooks the city. The appearance was truly imposing and grand, and for, very far, exceeded any thing which we could expect.

The main street of the city extends back from the river more than a mile in a straight line. The procession, in compact order, extended nearly the whole distance. Lafayette's reception is remembered by the citizens of Hudson as a parade exceeding any thing which had ever been witnessed there, and we heard many persons assert that the procession on this occasion exceeded the former in length and number of persons.

The procession moved the whole distance of the city and returned up to the court house, where the president was received by Rufus Reed, esq. the chairman of the committee of arrangements, who addressed him as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT: In behalf of the citizens of Hudson, I bid you a most cordial welcome to our city and county. The deep and thrilling interest which your presence excites, cannot be well and adequately described, except by referring to the cheerful and happy countenances which throng around this hall and park, all anxious to express their profound respect for the chief magistrate of a great and happy nation of freemen. Other cities and villages through which you have passed in your journey hither, have assemled to pay the homage due to your private virtue and eminent public service; but we, sir, are moved not by these considerations alone. We are impelled also by personal esteem and respect arising from many years of intimate and friendly intercourse in your early life. This county claims the honor of your nativity, and the city of Hudson ranked you for many years among her eminent and highly respected citizens. This was the scene of your early, and I trust I may be permitted to add, brilliant professional career. Among those here assembled, you will recognize many, very many, of your early friends and companions, who, with their sons too, have come to express to you feelings flowing from warm and generous hearts, and to congratulate you on your first visit to your native county since your election to the presidency."

To which the president replied:

"I beg of you, sir, and of my fellow citizens who are here assembled, to accept my heartfelt acknowledgments for the very affectionate manner in which you have been pleased to welcome this, my first visit to my native county, since my election as president of the United States.

"The topics to which you have adverted are of an absorbing nature. They indicate the working of just and generous minds, and it requires but few words to make them understood. I dare not trust myself, sir, to describe the feelings they have excited in my own breast, farther than to say that they are cordially, deeply, and sincerely responsive to those which you have so kindly and eloquently expressed. Let me add, that it is to me a source of inexpressible pleasure to meet so many of the associates of my youth, and of my maturer years, under circumstances so truly flattering—a pleasure which is without alloy, save only the regret experienced from being reminded of the loss of many ancient and highly valued friends, but the appearance of their descendants here, to do me honor. I am happy in finding myself once more in the midst of those with whom my career in life commenced, and among whom I may be permitted to close it. In revisiting a city where some of my happiest years were spent, and which is associated with so many gratifying recollections, I resolve in mixing familiarly with a community for whose prosperity and happiness I cherish a solicitude which neither time nor circumstances can efface."

The thousands who had assembled in the square were then introduced to the president, after which he was escorted to his quarters prepared for him at the Hudson house. In the evening this elegant and commodious hotel was illuminated, and all the youth and beauty of Hudson called and were introduced to the president.—Their enthusiasm towards the distinguished companion of their fathers, was becoming and cordial, and the women of that pleasant and enthusiastic place seemed determined that nothing on their part should be wanting to rehaus the hospitality of the city. For several hours his rooms were crowded with anxious and delighted visitors. It was a complete triumph over the people of old Columbia. All the old patriarchs of the democratic party were there. Among them, we noticed many who commenced their adherence to the democratic principles in the days of Jefferson. It was a proud day for the president.—The companions of his youth had not forgotten him or the honor of their country, and he here saw how impotent are the inclinations of mere political mercenaries to repress the ardent affections of the people towards a man they have voluntarily elevated to the highest office known to the governments of the world.

It was gratifying, too, to perceive that, maugre the efforts of the federal leaders, very many of the "whigs" of the county united in paying suitable respect to the president. We heard many of them consent the conduct of the common council, and asserth that they had left their harvest fields at a at a most important period, to show their disapprobation of such proceedings."

At Kinderhook, Mr. Van Buren's birth place, where he arrived on Saturday, accompanied by the Hudson committee of arrangements, the population, according to the same account, turned out en masse, and the welcome was as enthusiastic and cordial as it was possible to imagine.

From the New York Era.
THE PRESIDENT AT HUDSON.

We give to-day an account of the cordial reception of Mr. Van Buren in his native county. It was indeed, a glorious occasion, gratifying and honorable to him and his friends, while it was a mortifying rebuke and disgrace to his enemies. The common council of Hudson have been in this matter mere tools in the hands of more designing men, who aimed to insult the president in his own county, and in this they were aided from abroad. Their resolutions have been and are now placarded in large handbills, posted in different parts of this city, with a heading of "glorious whig victory! Make way for Columbia! Mr. Van Buren at home." The "whig" papers here and in Albany, have exulted over the degree of what they call "patriotism." The "whigs" in Hudson sent circulars throughout the county, urging their friends to remain at home. And notwithstanding all their efforts, his reception "at home" was enthusiastic beyond comparison. The concourse of the people and the length of the procession were unparalleled in that city. Men of all parties joined in doing him honor, and they who aimed at his disgrace were denounced by their own friends, and covered with shame by the assembled yeomanry of the county of his birth.

Hail, Columbia!—the president's reception at home.
The great pains which have been taken to mar the president's reception in his own county—the extraordinary course pursued by the "authorities" of the capital of the county—and the praises which the federal whig press have so liberally bestowed upon that course, created in us some anxiety to witness his reception at Hudson, so that we might bear true witness. We therefore visited that place on Friday last, and witnessed his reception both there and at Kinderhook.

It was apparent, from many things which we witnessed at Hudson, as well as here, before and since our visit, that the proceedings of the common council had been suggested from abroad, and that its members had been mere tools in the hands of those who designed to disgrace the president in his native county. We were therefore the more pleased at a reception which was as gratifying as it was unexpected; which exceeded our warmest hopes, and which inflicted upon the actors in the attempted disgrace, rebuke as severe as it was merited. The reception of Mr. Van Buren at our city was great, but that at Hudson, considering the difference in population of the two places, far surpassed. It was not a parade of the military, but an assemblage of the people—a demonstration of the democracy.

It was not a reception by the great mass of the people of Hudson alone, but by the democracy of the whole county, who left their fields in the midst of their harvest, and hastened to honor the man whose value and merit they well appreciated, and to vindicate the honor of their county—to erase the stain it had received at the hands of a few intemperate and short-sighted men:

"From her mountains and her plains in troops they came."

The hardy yeomanry—the unpurchasable sons of toil, the patriarchs of the party—the companions of his youth, all were there, and welcomed him, not with the slight and formal shake of the hand, but with the cordial and lengthened grasp, and the pleasure-beating countenance. The thousand anecdotes of his boyhood's home, of which the people were constantly reminding him, gave an increased and absorbing interest to his reception. Old soldiers of the revolution, too feeble to join in the procession, yet came miles to see him, and seated by the way side, added their slouts of welcome. "I have," said one, "voted the democratic ticket for 40 years, and I want to live to give him one more vote." "Thirty years ago!" exclaimed another, "he and I fought side by side against the federalists, and I will never desert him." "It was a plain farmer's boy when I first knew him," cried a third, "and now, boys, see what honesty and industry can make you." Such was the feeling of the old and the young, and he may well be proud of his reception in his native county.

The day was fair, but excessively warm. At eleven o'clock, a mounted escort of young men assembled in front of Slaats's National hotel, and with the committee of arrangements, proceeded to Greenport, a distance of four miles, to escort him to the city. The streets now began to assume a most animated appearance. Wagons from all parts of the country were continually arriving, laden with independent citizens. The windows were crowded with females, and the streets filled with the expecting multitude.

Incidents at Hudson. We were walking along the main street, when we were introduced to an old soldier of the revolution, who was sitting by the way side in the shade. He told us that he was nearly 90 years old, that he could not walk much, but had crawled out to see a democratic president. More than 30 years ago he gave me my ticket at an election, and we have always voted together since. After the procession had gone by, as we passed the old man, he stopped us, and with a hearty shake of the hand, a moistened eye and a trembling voice he said, "he saw me—he knew me—he nodded to me, and only let me live to see him president once more, and then I shall be ready to die."

A "whig," who had been for years an active and servicable man for his party, but who was disgusted with the proceedings of the common council, called to see the president. As he left him, he exclaimed in a loud voice, "if I ever vote against him again, may my right hand drop off."

An old fellow, who was standing in the shade, to see the procession pass, and who seemed to be getting tired, cried out, "Is there no end to it? There have as many passed already as we had at Bunker hill."

A gentleman of great respectability, called among others to see the president, and their interview was truly affecting. "I am an old man," said the gentleman; "I have passed four score years—I am very infirm but I have not yet forgotten, Mr. Van Buren, the kindness you did me on such an occasion," naming it. The president begged him not to speak of that as a mere trifle. "It was not a trifle to me sir. It saved me, when you ran a great hazard, and could gain nothing. I cannot let you go. I cannot expect to live long, but I hope to have yet one more chance of showing my gratitude."

We overheard a "whig" say, "what cursed fools our folks are! Here they have tried to disgrace the president, and the whole county has turned out to honor him! Just so they always act. They have always been helping him along. I don't believe in such a way of doing things."

The ladies in Hudson seemed determined to redeem their city from the stain of inhospitality. They filled the windows as the president passed along, and in the evening they crowded to see him. His drawing room at Washington never was more crowded. The wives and daughters of federalists came as ready as any. The wife of one of the functionaries, who desired to prohibit any honor to the president, took pains to send one of his clerks to join in the procession. One lady sent him a beautiful bouquet, and the other carried it said that he was forbidden to talk to her, and it was a late hour before these marks of respect ceased.

The president was reminded by an old gentleman who came more than twenty miles to see him, of his having successfully defended one of his sons from some unjust combination. "Poor Joseph," said the old man, "is gone, but I and my two other sons yet live to show our gratitude, and we are all here."

A man wretchedly maimed, was presented to the president, as one who had held fast to his political faith, amid misfortunes and distress, and poverty and temptation. "Such men," was the reply, "are the safety of the country." [N. Y. Era.]

Correspondence of the Argus.

THE PRESIDENT AT KINDERHOOK.
Kinderhook, July 20, 1839.

I have witnessed to-day one of the most animating and gratifying sights I have ever beheld. It was the reception of Mr. Van Buren by the citizens of this and the adjoining towns, in his his native place.

To the president, the cordial welcome of his old associates, his friends, and many of them his former townsmen, who have seen and marked his course almost from infancy until this time, upon his first visit among them since his accession to the chief magistracy of this country, must have been as gratifying, as it was irrepresible and almost overwhelming. The good feeling that pervaded the community, the eagerness with which preparations were made for his reception upon a short notice, and the enthusiasm which marked the reception, stand out in bold characters, and not only proclaim the strong confidence we have in the integrity and talent, but in the correctness with which he has discharged the duties of chief magistrate, and his fitness to contend with such difficulties in future as may present themselves in the course of his administration. And who, more competent to form an opinion of both the man and the statesman, than those who have been the most familiar with him, and have marked his capacity and virtue from early life? Surely, with such advantages, they of all men should be the best enabled to decide correctly, and of that decision they have this day given public evidence, by the more than cordial welcome with which they have signified his arrival among us.

The time when this would occur was not known until the previous afternoon. Some few preparations had however been made, at a preliminary meeting of the inhabitants—such as the appointment of committees to act whenever it might take place. It having been intimated on Friday, that the president would meet them on Saturday, the committee of arrangements gave notice, that at about 12 o'clock he would be received at Glencadia, about three miles below this place. At 10 o'clock a mounted escort of the field officers of the infantry and cavalry officers was formed in this village, and despatched together in a carriage for the president, in which his brother had taken his seat, to the place appointed for his reception.

About half past ten, the citizens on horseback, and in carriages, together with the committee, formed a line under the order of a chief marshal and six assistants, and followed the escort. Upon arriving at the place designated for the first reception of the president, each horseman and carriage wheeled about into line, bringing the horseman in front and the committee of arrangements in rear, leaving an open space for the president with the military escort in his rear. In a short time the president arrived, accompanied by the committee of arrangements from Hudson, where he had been so cordially welcomed the day before. The moient his carriage stopped in sight of the assemblage, he was greeted with a cheer which made the welkin ring and the adjoining forest sound. The committee of arrangements now simply bade him welcome to his native place, to which he replied in a few and appropriate remarks. His carriage was now placed in line as well as the carriages of the committee of arrangements from Hudson, by whom he was preceded, the military escort bringing up the rear. The whole cavalcade, headed by the marshal and assistants, next the citizens on horseback, two abreast, then the carriages in the order designated, with the escort forming a line of more than a mile in length, commenced their march for the village.

Upon approaching it through the principal streets, the students of the academy and schools, with their respective principals and teachers, had taken up a position in open line. The horsemen as they came up formed upon them, likewise in open line, facing inwards. The carriages formed in the same order as they came up and halted.—The committee of arrangements, headed by the chief marshal, now entered the open space, followed by the president. His escort, the committee of arrangements, and the citizens in carriages, now reversing thus reversed the first order of march, so that the horsemen were in the rear and the president in front. As his carriage passed through the lines of students they gave a simultaneous and hearty cheer. The streets were thronged with foot passengers. All windows were thrown open and filled with the fair, as were the balconies and piazzas. The waving of handkerchiefs and boughs, the greeting of the crowd, the enthusiasm which prevailed and in which all partook, the good feeling which was manifest in every direction—all united to overwhelm the feelings with the strongest emotion.

The cavalcade, in the order described, passed down and through Broad street, turned in the centre of the town down State street; from thence into Sylvester street and up Church street; and when the head of the procession again reached Broad street, the horsemen who formed its rear were still passing. In the four principal streets therefore, and around the largest block of buildings was one dense mass in rolling and moving order.

When the head of the procession arrived at Stranblan's hotel, and the president's carriage drove up, the feelings of the multitude burst out in tremendous cheerings.—Having taken his position in the balcony in front of the hotel, together with the two committees of arrangement, and a crowd of ladies, the president was addressed in presence of the assemblage, by the chairman of the committee of arrangements, in an appropriate and feeling manner. His reply was one of the most effective and beautiful addresses I have ever heard delivered.—The justness and propriety of the sentiments, the pertinency of the language, the grace of the delivery, the feeling allusion to the scenes he had passed through from the time he was a youth to the present, was such that all hearts were melted, and he himself almost overcome by the bare repetition of them.

No combination of words could do more. The simple relation was founded on truth, and its narrative had won the hearts of his hearers. At its termination there was another burst of feeling in repeated cheers. He now took all by the hand that approached him, and exchanged congratulations with his old neighbors and friends. When dinner was announced he sat down with them at the public table. It was, however, understood beforehand that there were to be no set speeches nor toasts, but that it was to pass off as the meeting of friends after a long and painful separation. Thus has passed off the reception by his townsmen of Martin Van Buren in his native village, and although language may imperfectly pourtray the events of the day, it can scarcely do justice to the pleasing emotions which the occasion was so well calculated to excite.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE CITIZENS OF ALBANY.
The subjoined is governor Marcy's address to the president in behalf of the citizens of Albany:

SIR: Your return, after so long an absence, to the place where you resided for many years, to renew, for a brief period, your former social intercourse, is regarded with more than common interest, not only by your personal friends, but by a large portion of the inhabitants of this city and its vicinity. They are desirous to express, in a public manner, the sentiments called forth by the occasion; and have assigned to me the duty of tendering to you, on their behalf a cordial welcome. I shall not attempt to follow out the train of reflections elicited by your visit here at this time; but some of them recur so vividly to the mind, that I cannot forbear to make them the subject of a few casual remarks.

The remembrance of former intimacies and friendships is mingled with the recollection of important public transactions in which you bore a conspicuous part. Here you passed through some of the memorable trials which have attended your career as a public man. Among the vast concourse of your fellow citizens, here assembled to testify to your respect, you see some who were associated with you in many of those trials, and a great number who know, from their personal observation, the character and magnitude of your public services while you were connected with the affairs of the state.

The event which first made you generally known to the citizens of this place, was your appearance here as a member of the legislature, at the commencement of the war with Great Britain. In our halls of legislation, the policy and course of the general government in relation to that war, were arduously resisted. In some sense the battle of the country was fought in your halls. From thence issued a voice which resounded through the nation, and cheered her patriot sons in the most gloomy period of that eventful contest. There are now here those who well remember, and never can forget the zeal, firmness and ability you then exhibited, in vindicating the rights, sustaining the honor and calling forth the energies of the country.

Passing from the occurrences of that interesting period, we recall to mind your decided approval and efficient support of the measure of internal improvement for opening a communication between the western and northern lakes and the Atlantic ocean. The wisdom displayed in adopting a financial system to render the success of the measure certain, without even the hazard of oppressing the industry of the people by increased taxation, next to the bold conception of the practicability of the work, deserves our admiration, and reflects great honor upon you, and has exerted an important influence upon our legislative proceedings.

After this measure was adopted and placed upon such a basis as to ensure success, an important improvement in our political condition was undertaken. The experience of half a century had disclosed defects in the constitutional charter, established by our forefathers, when they renounced their colonial dependence. A germ of aristocracy had mingled with the seeds of liberty which they planted, and it began to produce bitter fruit. To render property inviolably secure to its possessors, is undoubtedly one among the chief benefits to be derived from the institution of governments; but this object can be well obtained without making properly the source of exclusive civil rights and privileges. Among the important changes made in our organic law, was the removal of the restriction it imposed upon the elective franchise. By evaluating this unsound principle from our constitution, a class of our citizens, who, by the adoption of our present institutions, amounted to many thousands, and whose number, in the progress of society, would have more than proportionately increased, was released from a partial disfranchisement, and placed upon an equality, in regard to their civil rights, with the more wealthy portion of the community. This improvement in our civil condition, deserves to be regarded as a memorable event in the progressive advancement of liberal principles, and we refer to your able advocacy of this principle on that occasion, as one among other causes of the kind reception which has every where awaited you on your present visit to this state.

In the course of events you were called to act in a public capacity on a large theatre. For some time previous to being placed in your present situation, you took an active and prominent part in conducting our national affairs. The majority of the people of the United States expressed their approval of your public conduct and of your political principles, by the highest testimonial they could give—they selected you for their chief magistrate.

You entered upon the duties of that exalted station in a critical conjuncture of public affairs. Wisdom, firmness and prudence were required to keep the government within the sphere of legitimate action. There is a powerful principle ever at work to produce partial legislation. It is the necessary condition of things, that what the government bestows as a favor upon the few, is directly or indirectly abstracted from the many. There never was in any former period of our history, a more distinct development of this principle, or a stronger temptation to yield to it, than that which arose from the unexampled pecuniary embarrassments of the country at the time of your accession to the presidency. Adhering with unshaken constancy to the only measure which, it was believed, could conduct the nation in safety through these embarrassments, arising from the fluctuations of trade, we rejoice to perceive that honest doubts, and in some instances, prejudices, have already yielded to the course of policy which has been pursued, and that the sources of the difficulties, as well as the efficacy of the remedy, are becoming better understood and more justly appreciated.

It is equally a cause of satisfaction to know that all the relations of government, both foreign and domestic, bear testimony in favor of the wise and pacific policy, which while it has guarded the rights and honor of the nation, has secured to all sections of it, even under border excitements of no ordinary magnitude, prosperous tranquility and the enjoyment of the blessings of free government.

In addressing you in behalf of my fellow citizens, I have not referred to the transactions you were engaged in, which connected with the political affairs of this state, with a design to rekindle the passions with which they were attended. These I would gladly leave to the cooling influence of time; but we ought not to lose sight of the principles they involved, and be unmindful of the services of those who have distributed to us the means to combat them, and to happy issues. Nor have I alluded to the embarrassment which beset your administration at its commencement, and the policy which was adopted in reference to it, with a view to give, in any degree a party aspect to our present proceedings. But it has been my object to show, by these references, that it is the services, the talents and the virtues by which the elevated station you occupy is merited, rather than the station itself, which interest the feelings and command the respect of a free people. It is these considerations, I think I am warranted in saying, reinforced by sentiments of friendship, contracted in years that are past, and the recollection of former social intercourse, which have assembled around you at this time, this large concourse of your fellow citizens, to greet you with an enthusiastic and warm hearted welcome.

To which the president replied:

It is to you, sir, and to this great assemblage of my fellow citizens, that I owe the grateful heart for the multiplied tokens of respect and kindness with which you have been pleased to distinguish my return to this city, after an absence of considerable duration and unusual interest. It would grieve me to suppose it possible that the time could ever arrive, when I should cease to regard them as among the proudest trophies of my public life.

The place where we stand is, as you intimate, pregnant with recollections of a stirring character. It has been the theatre of public acts and discussions extending through a long series of years, and producing results which are indelibly impressed upon the character and condition of the state, and will, for generations to come, constitute a most important portion of its history. According to the parts really taken in them by the public men of the day, will ultimately be their political destiny. It has been so with those who have gone before us—it must be so with those who will hereafter come after us. Deception and delusion may, for a season, depress the worthy and elevate the undeserving; but the final judgment of this people as to the tendency of public measures, and the motives of public men, is alike unerring and inflexible. That my own past life should be entitled to so favorable a construction in the estimation of one so capable of judging, and who has, with much credit to himself and usefulness to his country, been a prominent actor in many of the transactions referred to, is to me a source of great satisfaction.

I cannot refrain, sir, from availing myself of the occasion you have presented, to express the gratification I have derived from my journey between the seat of the general government and that of this great state. It is, I sincerely believe, no exaggeration to say that the world does not present an equal extent of country, possessing in so great a degree the true elements of public and private prosperity. The innumerable improvements on the face of the country, in the condition of the people and the capabilities for their still further advancement, which are every where seen and felt, and no where more apparent than in this honored city, are sufficient to gladden the hearts and excite the gratitude of all who witness them. But these great blessings are secondary in their importance to the conviction, which I think no intelligent and dispassionate observer can resist, of the daily increasing security of our inestimable political institutions—institutions to which we are chiefly indebted for the accomplishment of those great objects, and which so prominently distinguish us from the rest of mankind.

The leading and only saving feature of the system which these institutions were designed to uphold, undoubtedly are the exclusive management and control of public affairs, for their own benefit, by the people themselves, through their immediate, temporary and responsible representatives, with a total and perpetual exclusion of all orders of distinction save only those which private worth and services confer.

It requires but a slight consideration of the subject to satisfy us, in how great a degree, a plan of government, broadly based upon, and deriving its whole alient from public sentiment, is dependent not only for its success, but for its very existence, upon the dispositions and intelligence of the great masses of which the body politic is composed.—When they are either vicious, incompetent or even indifferent to the fate of the republic, the problem of its dissolution inevitably resolves itself into a question of time only. But in proportion as those masses become sensible of their impotence in the general scale, and qualify themselves to act worthily their respective parts,—inasmuch as the bluntest member of the community regards himself as a portion of the state, and an attack upon public order, or upon the principles of the government, as an assault upon himself, which it is as much his duty to resist as would be the invasion of his own domicile—so, and to such an extent, will the power, the stability, and the republican principles among the people be preserved. It is with the great and remarkable advance, which is making in the public mind upon this vitally important point, that I have been particularly struck in the extensive and familiar intercourse which it has been my happiness to have with my fellow-citizens during the last month. No ingenious man, with the same facilities of observation, could, I think, fail to perceive the increased interest which is now taken in the management of public affairs by the masses of the people—particularly by such as are denominated the laboring classes—who were heretofore comparatively listless upon the subject, anxiety with which they seek information, and their success in acquiring it. They, fortunately, every day become more and more sensible of the great truth, that, not possessing like others the means (even if they had the disposition to use them) of ministering to sinister influences, and of thus endangering the power, their only security lies in the preservation of a moderate, regular and constitutional conduct of public affairs, by which the protection of the law over all, shall be equally extended. Reasoning and believing thus, they are taking an active part in the government of the country; not, I sincerely believe, with the slightest desire to overturn or to impair, but to uphold, and resist abuses in, that system, which was so happily framed by our fathers; and the maintenance of which in its original purity, is more important to them than to almost any other portion of our fellow-citizens.

The approbation you have been pleased to express, sir, for yourself, and for those you represent, of my official conduct as president of the United States, is to me peculiarly gratifying. To the difficulties of my position you have done no more than justice, and it affords me the greatest satisfaction to learn from those whose good opinion is second to none, that my estimation in their eyes, in these difficulties have been rightly met and successfully maintained.

It can scarcely be necessary to say, sir, how cordially I reciprocate the assurance of personal regard to which you have in so kind a spirit alluded. My estimate of your worth was formed under circumstances too trying to be temporary, and will, I am persuaded, remain with me through life.

CHRONICLE.

George A. Scherpf, the German importing merchant, who sent a letter to the keeper of the New York city prison instead of the United States marshal, and then met the wrong person and offered to bribe him to procure certain papers relating to a charge of perjury, upon which he had been arrested some time since, was admitted to bail on last Saturday afternoon, and discharged from prison.

Copper. It is stated in the Baltimore Chronicle, that the recently discovered copper mine on Frederick county, belonging to captain Richard Cole, has been opened, and a shaft of fifteen feet sunk into the body of the bed. The ore appears to be inexhaustible, and equal in quality to any in the world.

The Mississippi valley, that is to say, country drained by the Mississippi and its tributaries, has been estimated at 1,400,000 square miles. Massachusetts has a population averaging 32 to the square mile. Were the great valley as thickly populated, it would contain 114,500,000 souls; about seven times the present population of the United States, and one-seventh of the probable population of the globe.

Or at 200 to the square mile, which is the rate of population in Great Britain, the Mississippi valley would sustain 28,000,000, nearly three-eighths of the entire population of the globe.

The region drained by the Mississippi and its branches, is ten times as great as the island of Great Britain, and in fertility of soil and resources of all kinds, is unsurpassed by any under the sun. Why may it not, in a century or less, be inhabited by a hundred millions of people?

[Cleveland Herald.]

Longevity. There is now living in this country, says the Raleigh, N. C. Register, of July 20, a man named Arthur Wall, who is 105 years of age, and who is in the enjoyment of good health and spirits. There is also a negro man, supposed to be about 125 years of age.

Illinois. In this state we have little short of half a million of inhabitants, more than 1,300 miles of rail roads, over 100 miles of canal in progress, and yet there are men living among us, who can recollect the time when there was not a single anglo-American in Illinois. Among the number of these is Colonel Meard, of Kankakee, whose name was given to a new county by the legislature at its last session. He saw the first steamboat ascend the Mississippi river. That improvement brought New Orleans within ten days of Illinois, which before was three months distant. He will, we hope, yet being in green old age, live to see an incident quite as important—the passage of a locomotive engine by the legislature at its last session. [Black Woodsman.]

The Illinois improvement system still continues to excite a great excitement in Illinois. At a meeting held lately in Peoria, strong resolutions were adopted recommending its "total abandonment," notwithstanding the admission that such a step would involve a sacrifice of $4,000,000.

Richmond flour inspections. The Whig of Tuesday says: "We learn from the inspector, that the extraordinary number of 239,149 barrels and half barrels of all qualities, were inspected during the year ending the 30th of June last. This is the largest number inspected for many years, and we believe his only once been exceeded."

Contracts for new wheat, red and white, deliverable in August, have been made by the Richmond millers at $1.10 per bushel.

The coal shipments. An erroneous impression having been entertained abroad, as to the comparative amount of shipments from the different coal regions, last year and the present, the Pottsville Journal has published the following statement from the printed report, which will place the matter in a correct light. The computation is made in round numbers, of the amount shipped up to the present time:

Schoykill,	157,000	188,000
Lehigh region,	74,000	80,000
Lackawanna, about	30,000	25,000
	261,000	307,000
		251,000

Excess of the present year, 46,000

Sluice at Key West. This half-way house, which receives so much of our West India commerce from coral reefs and sand banks, has already received this year over $75,000 in salvage. As the New York Sun says, it is but a small tax, perhaps, when it is considered, that without our wreckers and courts of admiralty, ten times the loss might fall on our commerce, without adverting to the frauds that might be more easily perpetrated under foreign jurisdiction, by intentional shipwrecks, false statements, collusion, &c. as has happened in former years.

The butchers of Pittsburg and Chambersburgh are buying beef cattle at from six to seven dollars the hundred weight. Calves, sheep and hogs at from five to seven cents per pound.

Health of Pensacola. Pensacola, as we learn from the Gazette, has a population of 2,200; and not a death has occurred in the city since the 1st of April! Is there another place on the continent that can say as much for itself!

Cumberland road. Major Ogden, who is engaged in making a reconnaissance of the route of the Cumberland road from Vandalia to the Mississippi, arrived in this city on Saturday evening last and has taken lodgings at the National hotel. He left his company about 20 miles from the city—they say will be here in a few days. We are told that it is his purpose to make an examination of two routes, one terminating here and the other at Alton. We believe it is also made his duty to reconnoitre the routes from the Mississippi to the city of Jefferson, in this state—and we presume, he will make a full examination of the respective localities on either side of the Missouri river. We trust our facilities which may contribute to a thorough examination of both routes.

[St. Louis, Mo. Republican.]

Liberal donation. Thomas W. Williams, esq. of N. London, Conn. one of the representatives elect to the next congress, has recently given $1,000 to the colonization cause. The Missionary, Bible and Tract societies have shared his munificence, and continue to do so.

The seat of government of Illinois has been removed to Springfield. The supreme court now in session there, has two constitutional questions to decide, viz: whether the governor has the power of removing the secretary of state at pleasure, and whether the legislative assembly have the right of voting under the constitution of the state.

Virginia manufactures. The Ettrick cotton factory at Petersburg has just declared a half yearly dividend of eight per cent, and the Merchaot's factory, at the same place, a half yearly dividend of nine per cent.

Bunker Hill monument. There appears now to be a fair prospect, that the funds necessary for completing the monument, estimated at $30,000, together with the further sum of $10,000 for grading and fencing the grounds, will be speedily raised, and that at no distant period the work will be completed. It has been stated in some of the papers that $14,000 of the necessary amount have been offered by four gentlemen of this city—brothers. It is stated that $500 have been offered by another gentleman—$1,000 by a third, and $10,000 by a gentleman at the south. These liberal contributions are offered on the condition that the necessary sum shall be obtained to complete this work at once—an object which as we have remarked, towards the end of the doubt will be attained.

[Boston Daily Ad.]

The universal Yankee nation. We copy the following from the Boston Daily Advertiser of Monday:

The schooner Gil Blas, Howes, which sailed hence about May 2, for Matamoros, arrived on the 27 days passage. She carried out a number of New England people, as machinists, &c. with machinery, for the establishment of a cotton factory in Mexico. There was some anxiety felt for her safety, as nothing definite was heard of her since her departure, until yesterday. Captain Howes writes that he was subjected to heavy fines, and that the various authorities, and the part of the custom-house officers. But by dint of perseverance, in asserting his rights, finally forced their acknowledgment. The Gil Blas has since arrived at Mobile.

New wheat. The Rochester Daily Advertiser, of a late date, says: New wheat was contracted for in this city, on Saturday, at $1 per bushel, and the prospect is, that it will be about the average price, for a time, at least. Some farmers will doubtless think it hard, to be obliged to sell their wheat for one dollar, after having, for the past few years, been in the habit of getting one dollar and twenty cents to two dollars per bushel. So long as they get two bushels with nearly the same labor, and on the same amount of ground that formerly yielded them but one, they have very little reason to complain.

The amount of tolls received on the Miami (Ohio) canal during the half year ending on the 1st instant, was $22,363, showing an increase of fifty per cent. over the tolls received during the corresponding period of last year. It is supposed that after the present year the canal will furnish a net revenue of one hundred per cent interest on the debt which has been contracted for their construction. Indirectly—in the increased value of property and of the products which are now sent to market at cheap rates—the cost of these works has been paid back many times over.

The Bonaparte family. A Marseilles journal remarks that the month of May is fatal to the Bonaparte family. Napoleon died May 5, 1821; Pauline Borghese, May 10, 1823; cardinal Ferey, May 13, 1829; Caroline Bonaparte, May 13, 1829. By the death of his late wife, he now has no surviving sister of Napoleon. His living brothers are Joseph, the eldest of the family, Louis, Lucien and Jerome. The three sisters of Napoleon were Eliza, Pauline and Caroline (Murat's widow), who took the name of countess of Liponi, as the anagram of Napoli, and a remembrance of her past greatness.

Slavery in Iowa territory. The first business session of the supreme court of the territory, was held in Burlington on the first week in May. The court decided that slavery was contrary to the laws of the territory, and that a slave taken there to work in the mines and permitted to hire his own time, gained thereby a right to his freedom.

Twenty-five hundred laborers are wanted on the Wabash and Erie canal, at the rate of one dollar weekly and a half cent per day.

The Louisville Gazette, of the 16th instant, under the head of "quick transportation," says: "A gentleman of this city sent recently to England for some shrubs, plants and flower seed; his letter was received by his New York correspondent on the 30th of April. The shrubs, plants and seeds were purchased in London, on the 17th of May, and they are now set out and actually growing in a Louisville garden."

The Boston Times seems to doubt the extent of the law practice of the distinguished Prentiss, of Mississippi. We know that he has now on hand, besides other suits, four, for which the fees are $10,000 each. [N. Y. Star.]

Carriages in Paris. Great complaints are making in Paris of the crowds of vehicles which block up the streets. This is not surprising, for while in 1815 there were only fifteen thousand in Paris, the number is now quadrupled, being no less than sixty-one thousand in 1833, viz: cabriolets, hackney coaches, diligences and omnibuses, twenty thousand; cabs, &c. thirty-eight thousand; private and livery carriages, six thousand.

Sylvester's (New York) Reporter, of the 8th inst., says: "In the account of Barnstable, a company of Missouri, has disposed of six hundred thousand dollars of its stock to an agent of the Messrs. Rothschilds, of this city. The company can have any amount of money they require to carry the works into operation from the same source at 5 per cent. The quality of the iron is to be examined by two manufacturers of the article in New York and Baltimore, now on their way to the iron region."

Two hundred thousand dollars damages are claimed by the heirs of Mr. Storer, recently killed on the Philadelphia and Trenton rail road.

Historical facts. In Barker's collections of Massachusetts historical facts occurs the following: "An account of Barnstable. We meet with two singular facts. It is stated that the West Barnstable church is the first Independent Congregational church of that name in the world! It was organized in England, 1616, by Henry Jacob, who, after preaching eight years, fled from persecution to Virginia, where he died. The second minister, rev. John Lohrbor, with forty-two of his church, were apprehended and imprisoned. In two years, on promise to leave the country, he was liberated, and came to New England, and finally settled at Barnstable in 1629. A large rock is said to be near the place where the first public meetings were held. It is another singular fact, that the first Baptist church in England, of that name, sprang from the first Congregational church in West Barnstable. One of the members while in England, brought a child to be rebaptized. This was refused, and on mature consideration, a large majority of the church voted against the innovation.—The few who desired the rebaptism withdrew, and thus originated the denomination called Baptists."

The machine shop of Mr. William Norris, the celebrated manufacturer of locomotives, was destroyed by fire on the 20th ult. The U. S. Gazette thus notices his liberality to two of the fire companies which were present on the occasion:

"We mentioned briefly, yesterday, that a generous individual, named Schuyllkill hose company, fifty dollars; and have since learned that we did not give Mr. Norris credit for all his liberality. He also presented to the Good Will engine company the like sum. The reason for selecting these companies is, that they remained until after daylight to secure, if necessary, the premises of that gentleman from injury. Mr. Rush also gave the last named company twenty-five dollars."

Deaths in high life. Looking over a London paper, among the law reports, we found that a rule nisi for an attachment was granted against lord John Russell, for some alleged contempt of court; that another, for something else, was applied for against the marquis of Normanby; and that Daniel O'Connell was brought up for withholding a letter that had been entrusted to him by one of his clients, and which he retained because it would be highly important to him, he said, in his action for slander against lord Normanby. [N. Y. Com. Adv.]

The following, from the New York Express, will enable our readers to form some estimate of the expenses incurred in the publication of a daily paper, and to multiply the estimation of each week, to say nothing about paper, ink, wear and tear of type, rents, &c. &c.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE

☞ The president of the United States arrived at Saratoga Springs on Thursday the 1st inst. and is now there.

Mr. Clay had visited Montreal and Quebec, and was expected at Burlington (Vermont) on Tuesday, and was to attend the commencement of the University on Wednesday last.

☞ We find the following in the Globe of Wednesday evening:

"The postmaster general having been called to his paternal mansion by the dangerous illness of his father, all his powers and duties devolve, during his absence, upon S. R. Hobbie, esq. his first assistant."

The secretaries of state, and navy, and the attorney general, are also absent from Washington, and will, as we learn from the Intelligencer, continue absent for some weeks. Major S. Cooper, assistant adjutant general, is acting secretary of war, and commodore I. Chauncey acts as secretary of the navy.

The Army and Navy Chronicle states that the secretary of war will stop at Cattaraugus, where he is to hold a treaty with the Indian tribe in that vicinity. At Saratoga Springs he will join the president of the United States, and they in company will make a tour over Lakes Ontario and Erie, as far as Detroit—and possibly to Saint St. Marie.

Major gen. Macomb is also absent from Washington on a visit to Warrington, Va. Springs.

MINISTER TO RUSSIA. The United States Gazette, says: "We understand that George M. Dallas, esq. minister to Russia, has obtained leave to return home, and is expected in this city in September next, to resume his profession, in which he has been so ably and so advantageously known." It is said that Mr. Cambreleng will succeed Mr. Dallas as minister to the court of St. Petersburg.

THE COTTON CIRCULAR. The N. Y. Commercial, says it is very well understood that the cotton circular, which appeared in New York some weeks since, backed by Mr. S. V. Wilder, and which was supposed to have emanated from the bank of the United States, was written by gen. Hamilton of South Carolina.

NORTH CAROLINA. Messrs. Edward Stanley, M. T. Hawkins, Charles Shepard and Jesse A. Bynum, all members of the last congress, have again been elected. It is stated that Kenneth Rayner has succeeded over Mr. Sawyer. Particulars in our next. The remaining nine districts voted on Thursday last.

THE FLORIDA WAR. It will be seen by the accounts published in another page, that the Florida Indians have utterly disregarded the so called, "treaty" which gen. Macomb made with Chitto Tusunuggee, the self appointed successor of Sam Jones, and commenced an indiscriminate slaughter of all the white settlers within their reach, and that they are now better prepared to carry on their bloody work than they were before that unfortunate arrangement was entered into.

The treaty and the savage deeds which have followed it, have created the greatest indignation in Florida and throughout the country, and the government must take some decided measures to expel the savage murderers, let them cost what they may, or abandon the territory to their uncontrolled sway—for now no man can reside without the limits of a populous settlement unless at the hazard of his life. As one means of exterminating them, it is proposed to employ either United States mounted volunteers, from parts of the country which are familiar with the habits and mode of fighting of the Indians—and who can operate without being controlled by the United States officers, and who can with proper guides dash into the woods and hammocks, &c.—or, entering persons, who will be allowed to settle on portions of the public lands, upon condition of fighting the Indians and protecting the country, &c.—or, both these, and similar species of force combined, are considered the best troops for the purpose. A small and bold band of about 40 men have consented to act, under a leader, to hover over the hiding places, and dash among the enemy. They are to be allowed so much for the scalp of each Indian warrior, or a prisoner, and the money has been raised by private subscription among the people of Florida.

It will be also seen by reference to the Florida news, that commissioners have been despatched to confer with the president on the best means of protecting the territory.

Since the above was prepared for the press, we have received the following disastrous intelligence:—

Office of the News, St. Augustine, Aug. 3.

The war renewed! The following account of the surprise of col. Harney's command, reached here this morning by express. Col. Gales, commanding east of St. John's, has transmitted orders for the immediate defence of the posts south.

Asst. Adjt. General's office, Army of the south, Fort Brook, (E. F.) July 29, 1839.

Sir: It becomes my painful duty to inform you of the assassination of the greater part of lieutenant col. Harney's detachment by the Indians, on the morning of the 23d instant on the Colesahatchie river, where they had gone in accordance with the treaty at Fort King, to establish a trading house. The party consisted of about 25 men, armed with Colt's Rifle; they were encamped on the river, but unprotected by defences of any kind, and it is said without sentinels. The Indians in large force made the attack before the dawn of day, and before reveille, and it is supposed that 13 of the men were killed, among whom was major Dallam and Mr. Morgan, settlers. The remainder, with col. Harney, escaped; several of them severely wounded. It was a complete surprise.

The commanding general therefore directs, that you instantly take measures to place the defences at Fort Mellon in the most complete state of repair, and be ready at all times to repel an attack, should one be made. No portion of your command will, in future, be suffered to leave the garrison except under a strong escort. The detachment at Fort Matiland will be immediately withdrawn.

Should Fort Mellon prove unhealthy, and the surgeon recommend its abandonment, you are authorised to transfer the garrison, and reinforce some of the neighboring posts. I am, sir,

Geo. H. GRIFFIN, asst. adjt. gen.

Lieut. W. E. Hanson, commander of Fort Mellon.

MEXICO. Intelligence has been received at New Orleans that Santa Ana had been driven from the presidential chair, and gen. Bravo elected in his place. Doubtful!

MR. CAMPBELL. The "Richmond Whig," in reply to the article copied in the REGISTER, of the 7th ult. from the Globe, stating the causes which induced the president to remove Mr. Campbell, says—We are authorised to say, that the article in the Globe of the 25th, contains the most atrocious falsehoods."

The "National Intelligencer" contained the following also in reply to the same article from the "Globe," which we postponed until the present, in anticipation of a statement from Mr. Campbell, which will, doubtless, be laid before the public.

"We have been requested by a friend of the late treasurer Campbell to say, that the statement of the Globe of Thursday evening last, in relation to the official conduct of that officer, is not true, as will in due time be made to appear.

"As to the intimation of the Globe that Mr. Campbell was removed from office because of occasional absence from the duties of his office, and suffering them to be discharged in part by persons in the office subject to his orders, it may be remarked, that this is at least a new offence in the catalogue of unpardonable sins. There is no office at the seat of government, we believe, in which the constant personal presence and action of the chief and responsible officer are supposed to be indispensable. Certainly it is not so in the case of much higher offices than that of the treasurer.

"As a particular illustration to the contrary, (and not with any intention to find fault with it), may be mentioned the fact that the secretary of state charged with the most important of the administrative duties under the president, having but just returned to his office, after an absence of several weeks, is again absent from it, and will remain so, probably, for as many weeks more; and that it has frequently heretofore happened that important correspondence in the office of the secretary of state has been carried on, in the absence of the secretary, (both before and since Mr. Forsyth held the office), by the principal clerk of that department. To a greater or less extent, the same has been the case with other heads of bureaus; but no president has ever before considered such absences as constituting a sufficient ground for the removal of the head of any department from office. Instead of the case of Mr. Campbell having been brought within any known rule, therefore, his case has been made an exception, and an unknown rule applied apparently to effect a premeditated purpose.

"There would be some plausibility in the pretence upon which Mr. Treasurer Campbell's removal is justified, if, like those western sub-treasurers who were not removed, but retained in office or re-appointed, he had appropriated to his own use, or caused to be lost or wasted, any of the public funds committed to his charge. But nothing like this is alleged; nothing of the sort can be pretended. On the contrary, whilst some hundreds of millions of dollars have been received and disbursed under the direction of Mr. Campbell, not a dollar had been lost or misapplied through any neglect or misconduct in the treasurers' office. All the public money that ever came within the control of the treasurer, whilst he held the office, has been faithfully kept, and, in every instance, we believe, disbursed according to law."

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL. We learn from the National Intelligencer that the stockholders of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company assembled in general meeting in Washington on Monday last, when the "revising committee" appointed by the stockholders on the 3d of June last, made a very interesting report in relation to the past proceedings of the company and its future prospects. The report was adopted by the unanimous vote of the meeting, and will, under a standing order of the stockholders, be printed in pamphlet form.

NAVAL. The U. S. sloop of war Warren, Wm. A. Spencer, esq. commander, arrived at Pensacola on the 14th July, from a cruise down the gulf, last from Metamoras. The U. S. ship Erie, commander Taylor, was seen standing in for the anchorage off Tampico, on the morning that the Warren took her departure from that place.

The court of inquiry in the case of commodore Elliott, has adjourned; but from the mass of testimony to be examined by the revising power, it will be some time before the opinion is made known, if indeed it be made known at all, without a call from congress, or its being such as to require a court martial.

By reference to our navy head, it will be seen that lieutenant Edwin W. Moore has resigned his commission in the U. S. navy; consequently there can be no longer any doubt of his having accepted the command of the Texan navy.

[Army and Navy Chronicle.

DIAMONDS. A daughter of Mr. Swain, of Philadelphia, attended a ball at Saratoga, a few evenings since, adorned with a circlet of diamonds worth $20,000. Only think what a host of poor sick devils contributed toward its purchase, by swallowing her father's panacea!

[Boston Post.

We depise the foolish pride which induced a parent thus to decorate his daughter—but would ask our brother of the Post, if it is not better thus to appropriate the profits of physicking "poor sick devils" than to sport a splendid equipage purchased with the hard earnings of the widow and the fatherless? And yet our cities are crowded with the latter, and honest people, who would "throw physic to the dogs," bow to their owners and praise them as clever fellows!

MATHEW CAREY. The following beautiful and truly tribute to this untiring philanthropist, is from the Philadelphia U. S. Gazette. The editor ought to have added, that his charitable efforts in behalf of the poor of his own city, form but a small portion of his good works to benefit mankind. As one of the most able advocates of the American System, the most noble cause that ever inspired an American patriot, he has placed his countrymen under lasting obligations; and the day is not distant, when his services will be acknowledged with gratitude, even by those who most resolutely opposed his principles.

"Honor to whom honor is due. Among the men of the present age who occupy lofty places as philanthropists, I know of none who stand higher than our venerable fellow citizen, Mathew Carey. It is conceded on all hands, that were a large sweep made into his numerous charities, and into his acts for the relief and comfort of suffering humanity, that one act alone, which is wholly his own, in conception and execution, of obtaining relief for the out-of-door poor, (that is, for those who cannot, for the thousand reasons that press upon hearts of a certain mould and texture, pass the threshold of the almshouse,) would stand as an enviable and enduring monument to his fame.

"In view of such a charity, how do the ordinary acts of man sink into insignificance! The strife after gains, the efforts to climb the way to public honor, up the soiled precipice which leads to it—how do these sink into insignificance in comparison of such a work of mercy as this!"

WAR AMONG THE NORTHERN INDIANS. From the St. Louis Republican. By a letter from a gentleman residing at fort Snelling, dated July 10th, to a house in this city, and from which we are permitted to take the following extract, we learn that a most unhappy state of affairs is now existing between the Sioux and Chippeway tribes of Indians, and great slaughter has been made of the latter. Mercy seems to have formed no part of the savage character. One indiscriminate massacre of men, women, and children appears to be the rule of warfare. [It may elucidate the extract to state that a large number of the Chippeway tribe had assembled at fort Snelling to receive their annuities, and the events which followed, related below, occurred a few days prior to the date of the letter.] The extract says:

"The Sioux and Chippeways have had a brush at two different points on the St. Croix, and again about thirty miles above the Falls of St. Anthony. The Chippeways, just before leaving the pillagers, I believe, had killed at Lake Calhoun a Sioux brave, one much liked and esteemed by his tribe, and took his scalp; an hour or two after sunrise, the news having spread like wild fire, the Sioux, about two hundred strong, left the Falls, (St. Anthony.) Hale-in-the-day, a Chippeway chief, had pushed on with his party, and was not overtaken. The Sioux who left the Falls came across a party of the Rum River Band, attacked them about sunrise the next morning, and killed one hundred and thirty-three men, women and children. This was above the Falls. Big Thunder, a Sioux chief, crossed the country in pursuit of the Strong Ground Band of Chippeways, and overtook and fought them at St. Croix. Big Thunder told the Sioux not to fire where the whites were, (Messrs. Atkins and McLoud's party), and as the Chippeways huddled round the whites, many of them thus escaped.—Notwithstanding, the Sioux killed thirty-six men of the Chippeway party, and some women and children.

"The country is in great excitement, and will continue so for some time. There will no doubt be a general engagement between the Sioux and Chippeways before many months more. Hale-in-the-day, is a chief not to be trifled with, and the Sioux are consolidating under his flag, a first rate warrior, who has been to Washington.

"This is the substance of the extract referred to, and is an evidence of the unhappy state of affairs existing between those tribes. The next news in all probability will be an account of the slaughter of an equal or greater number of the Sioux by some band of the Chippeways.

GEN. SCOTT left this city on Monday evening, the 29th ult. for the east, via the Falls and Sacketts Harbor. We learn what is almost unnecessary to state, that the result of his western mission has been highly satisfactory. In 1832 Gen. S. concluded a treaty with the Winnebagos by which that tribe ceded to the United States, a great portion of their territory in Wisconsin, in exchange for a very liberal annuity, and a tract of land west of the Mississippi, agreeing at the same time to remove. It has since been ascertained that the tract west of the Mississippi, is not as valuable nor as extensive as was supposed at the time of making the treaty of '32, and the Indians have also manifested a disposition not to remove any where, although very willing to receive the annuity punctually.

They are as demoralized a tribe as can be found on the continent, and serious apprehensions of trouble were entertained. To put matters straight, and to allay any hostile feelings which might exist on the part of the Winnebagos, was the object of gen. Scott's mission, and as we have said above, he has accomplished his undertaking. The Indians have accepted a large and fertile tract of country south of the Missouri, and have agreed positively to remove. We congratulate the citizens of Wisconsin on this removal of one great obstacle to the rapid settlement of their fine territory.

There were some coincidences during general Scott's journey, which may interest some of our readers. He had stopped at one of the ports of Wisconsin with the intention of procuring a canoe to cross to Fort Winnebago; but being unable to find any, was obliged to take the Illinois, then on her way to Chicago, which he did on the anniversary of the battle of Chippewa. Returning he took the same boat, on the anniversary of the battle of Lund's Lane. Blake, the captain of the boat, and as fine a specimen of the frank, gallant sailor as ever lived, was a common soldier under Scott at one of these battles, and for his conspicuous bravery was by him, on the field, promoted to the rank of sergeant. Neither party had forgotten the event, which was duly commemorated on its 25th anniversary. [Buffalo Com. Adver.]

FROM BUENOS AYRES.—"The British Pocket" of the 25th of May last, received at the Exchange Reading Rooms, contains a long correspondence between commodore John Nicholson and the United States navy, commanding the naval forces on the de Brazil and the Rio de la Plata, and governor Rosas, of Buenos Ayres. It appears that the American commander felt it incumbent upon him to offer his services as a mediator between the government of the Argentine republic and the representatives of the French government, with a view to reconcile the differences which have given rise to the existing blockade of Buenos Ayres.

His communication to that effect received at the hand of governor Rosas a courteous answer, in which he expresses a wish to be satisfied of the authority by which the commodore acted, to which the latter replies that he acted by the verbal authority of the French charge d'affaires and admiral. It would seem that the governor entertained doubts as to the power of the charge d'affaires to arrange the difficulty, inasmuch as the French consul had previously stated that he alone was authorized to treat in the premises, and the minister plenipotentiary of France had said in a note to the charge de Mirigny, the charge d'affaires "would enter upon his official duties after the conclusion of the differences between France and the republic."

The basis of an amicable arrangement offered by the governor, through the commodore, secures protection to the French persons and property, and places them in regard to military duty, as heretofore, on the same footing with other nations, with which the republic has no treaty. It also proposes indemnification for any losses justly sustained by the French, should the same be proved, and requires a like indemnity to Buenos Ayrean subjects, together with the restoration of the island of Martin Garcia, and restitution for injuries committed by the French along the shores of the river of Plate and elsewhere. To these the American commander objects, in the form set forth, and suggests a modification which proved unacceptable to the governor.

As anticipated by commodore Nicholson, the proposition of Rosas was rejected by the French admiral and charge d'affaires. The modification proposed by commodore Nicholson provides for a prospective treaty, and that the indemnities shall be settled according to the law of nations instead of the laws of Buenos Ayres, with some minor points. It seems to have been the desire of both parties to constitute H. B. Majesty the referee in the event of their not agreeing. Commodore N. tendered the use of the United States ship Fairfield as the place of meeting of the parties to discuss the indemnities, as neutral ground, and appears to have been actuated throughout the affair by a sincere desire to bring about a reconciliation. Perhaps this desire may have induced him to overlook points of etiquette which the Buenos Ayrean government was not so willing to dispense with—such as the presentation of credentials on the part of the French charge d'affaires,—before any official action could be had in a matter of national importance. NO RUN ON THE BANKS AND THE LAST NEWS FROM ENGLAND. We are mortified to see any portion of the press recommending a run on the banks.

We object still more to the exhortations from some profligate quarters, that the banks and merchants should ship all their specie to England.

An attempt at any thing of that kind would be suicidal to them. Neither depositors nor bill holders could be expected to look on quietly and see their only security for immediate payment torn from them, and placed in the hands of foreigners.

On the other hand, we earnestly hope, that while the banks make proper efforts to discharge their duties to their creditors here, they will be treated with forbearance and kindness.

Any other course will, in the end, prove as ruinous to the community at large, and especially the laboring classes, as to the banks.

It will not only derange the currency, but unsettle the prices of every thing, and make the poor and industrious portions of society a constant prey to sharks in the form of brokers and speculators.

Caution, justice, steadiness, economy and reasonable confidence, will carry all through the crisis except the few, whose inordinate rashness in the pursuit of wealth always exposes them to shipwreck in the lightest squall.

The last news from abroad, with the exception as to cotton, is certainly favorable.

The rate of interest has not been raised to six per cent. as was anticipated; the Bank of England had not been run upon for gold to pay the dividends, as some feared; the rate of exchange with the continent appeared improving; the English stocks did not decline; the budget had been opened, and the revenue was improving instead of growing worse; and the prospect of the crops was good.

Cheer up, then. Persevere steadily in retrenchment and industry. Put your own shoulders firmly to the wheels, rather than clog them, and all will be well with those who have any right to expect success. [Globe.]

THE BANK OF ENGLAND. The N. Y. Times says considerable excitement and alarm having been created in the English commercial world, by an announcement in the Banker's Circular and many of the London newspapers, that the Bank of England had refused to discount for joint stock banks and corn and cotton speculators, Mr. Atwood took occasion in the house of commons on the 8th July, to refer to the subject, with a view of ascertaining whether the statement in question was true.

Sir J. R. Reid, governor of the Bank of England, disavowed, on behalf of that institution, all intention to impose any such restriction. This disavowal, which from the high character of the individual making it, may be received with implicit confidence, puts at rest all fears that any invidious distinction will be made by the Bank of England as regards bills of exchange connected with these important commodities.

The course pursued by the Bank of England in contracting its discounts and augmenting its rate of interest, should in our opinion be referred to the suggestions of a wary policy, unmixing with hostility toward any particular branch of trade.

During the same debate Sir John Reid in referring to the gloomy condition of monetary affairs, said:

"It was his firm conviction and belief, that this present difficulty was a passing cloud, and that this cloud which overhung them had not been produced by any action of the bank, but by nothing more nor less than by the balance of trade being against them. He knew as a merchant, that the trade of the country was improving; he knew, also, that at the exports took place their money would be returned; and he had no doubt—no more anxiety—about seeing every thing rectified, than he had about seeing the sun rise to-morrow morning."

NATIONALITY OF WHALE SHIPS WITHOUT A LICENSE RE-AFFIRMED. In the U. S. court of the district, judge Belts presiding, some sailors of the whale ship Georgia were, on the 3d instant, tried for revolt. The defence was in part, that the Georgia not having a license was not to be considered, in virtue of recent decisions, as a foreign vessel—and that therefore, the court had no jurisdiction.

The court, as reported in the New York Express thus laid down the law: [N. Y. American.]

I lay it down as a rule of law, that persons at subject to criminal prosecution for offences committed on board American vessels on the high seas, in foreign ports, and that the ownership of the vessel determines her international character, within the interpretation of these laws.

Whatever effect the want of a license, and proceeding on a fishing voyage under a register may have as to the privileges and advantages of the ship under our revenue laws, her being documented by the one or the other improperly, does not denationalize the vessel. She may be subject to duties at disabilities at the custom house, as if not documented ed at all, or as if she was a foreign vessel, but no act of Congress takes away her intrinsic character of American property. But the court will go further, and say that vessels under a register, and not having a license, can be legally employed on a whaling voyage, and can come into American ports without subjecting themselves to the disadvantages or disabilities of foreign vessels. And that these vessels which go to the South Atlantic ocean, ought to be admitted on paying American tonnage duties, and no duty on the oil; and that the statute which requires a license refers to a different sort of trade.

IRELAND. Some counties of Ireland appear to be in a frightful state of distress. Colonel Percival recently called the attention of the government to the subject in the house of commons. He said—
He could not suffer one day to pass, having a knowledge of this distressing case, without putting a question to the government upon it. When hundreds of people are endeavoring to live on one meal a-day, and that composed of the worst description of potatoes, called bladders, with the aid of wild spinach, he felt it his duty at least to draw the attention of the government to the fact, and particularly to the state of the people of Newport. (Hear, hear).

Mr. O'Connell thought it was impossible that any discussion, in that house or out of it, could increase the amount of misery in Ireland. (Hear.) Owing to the failure of the second potato crop, the people were on the verge of starvation. He spoke with a knowledge of the state of things in Kerry, in which county the gentry had made every sacrifice and done all they could to alleviate the sufferings of their poor neighbors. The case was of that pressing nature that it was absolutely necessary that something should be done in the way of relief, without the least delay. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Serjeant Jackson said he had also received the most melancholy accounts from the south-western parts of the island. He had received four letters on this subject from Brandon and its neighborhood; and, to mention one fact only, it appeared that, out of a population of 7,000 persons, there were 3,000 in a state bordering on starvation, and 1,000 utterly destitute. A very small amount of relief from the government, promptly administered, would save great numbers of the population from perishing. (Hear, hear).

THE COST OF THE CANADAS TO GREAT BRITAIN. John Bull loves colonies dearly, or else he would not pay so dearly for them. The daily pay of 14,000 regular soldiers, to say nothing of volunteers, who squander more money than the regulars, would make as brother Jonathan would guess, a good many rail roads—According to the budget of the chancellor we see that the cost of keeping the Canadas is running the two great treasury ashore. If we had their 14,000 soldiers on our public works, with the officers and engineers, we would soon finish up our New York and Erie, and New York and Albany rail roads. The armed body in Canada is now estimated at 33,000 men. [N. Y. Express.

(From the Chancellor's speech.)
The extraordinary expenses in Canada in 1837-38, amounted to 245,620*l.* the extraordinary expenses in the following year was 701,400*l.* making a total of 947,000*l.* of extraordinary expenditure for the years 1837-38, and 1838-39, that is to the month of April, 1839. This included every article of extraordinary expenditure incurred in Canada, according to the best information I have. For this amount, a vote had been taken on account of 500,000*l.* Deducting this sum from 947,000*l.* there would remain a balance of 447,000*l.* to be provided for. This disposed of the expenditure of the two previous years. I now come to the possible expenditure of the present year for Canada. I shall take the total expenditure which bears on the subject at 1,101,300*l.* that is for the year ending April, 1840. Of this sum we have already provided for 500,000*l.* which has been voted on an estimate. In the charges are given of the force in Canada. This I do not mean to deal with at present, but there are certain other charges in the ordinance extraordinaries, which may be taken. Adding this amount to the sum I have just mentioned, we shall have the sum of 594,700*l.* provided for by estimates. Deducting this from the charge of 1,101,300*l.* there will remain a balance to be provided for of 506,600*l.* If this sum is added to the surplus of 447,000*l.* arising in the two previous years, it will appear that the total extraordinary expenses incurred in Canada for these three years, and not yet provided for is 1,053,000*l.*

This is not a state of things that can be regarded as satisfactory, and it is thought that the extra expenditure for Canada was likely to become a permanent charge, I should feel it to be my duty to come down to the house to propose that provision should be made accordingly, and I should feel it to be my duty to propose a tax to meet this charge. But this charge of a million does not apply to the service of the present year, but also to an arrear of charge for services ordinary and extraordinary for the whole of this extraordinary expenditure is not one which I contemplate as a permanent charge on the country. God forbid that Canada should continue to call for such an expenditure, and that we should not see the time when this charge might be greatly or entirely reduced. If the expenditure arises from circumstances of a temporary nature, I do not think it would be prudent, or that I could with justice ask the house to impose a permanent tax to meet the charge.

[The permanent tax must come, the way things are managed in the Canadas.]

SIR ALLAN MACNAB. About ten days ago some unfavorable reports reached this city from Upper Canada with respect to the hon. Allan MacNab, speaker of the house of assembly of that province, which, however, no one believed, though every one regretted to find that the gallant knight had been made the object of the malicious aspersions of his enemies.

We now rejoice to learn from the Toronto Patriot, that the whole of the reports in question were altogether void of foundation. The first of these reports alluded to by the Patriot, is a charge of forgery against sir Allan, which is scarcely necessary to add, the Patriot contradicts in terms of just indignation and scorn. It is added that sir Allan has entered a criminal infraction against the author of this falsehood.

The next report related to the private embarrassments of sir Allan MacNab, which is stated to have originated in the same quarter. The third report was that sir Allan's property at Hamilton had been seized, under legal proceedings, by the bank of Upper Canada, for a debt of £10,000; but the report turns out to be untrue, as the hon. gentleman owes that institution not one farthing for which the bank has not satisfactory security. In conclusion, the Patriot says:

The rest of the slanderous spawn we have neither time nor inclination to touch upon, except to say, that the two or three additional stories about executions, &c. &c. are all trifling lies, the consequence attendant upon the great ones, and we do trust the public, in all parts of the province, will express, in the most marked manner their indignation and abhorrence at the wicked and malicious slander with which the honorable and gallant speaker has been covered. [Montreal Gazette.

LETTER FROM SIR ISAAC COFFIN. From the British Naval and Military Gazette. It is again most gratifying to us that we are the channel of presenting another hundred pounds from our gallant and esteemed friend admiral sir ISAAC COFFIN to the royal naval school. The letter which we subjoin from this noble veteran and excellent sample of the best British sailor, will warm the heart of many a rich countryman, and we earnestly pray that the peers and rich countrymen of the land may not be unmindful of the appeal. This is the third hundred pounds we have received from sir Isaac Coffin, for the same patriotic purpose.

To the editor of the Naval and Military Gazette.

Cheltenham, June 6, 1839.
I have been sometime fitting for foreign service, or, as a landsman would say, terra incognita, and remain ready to trip my anchor at a moment's notice.

The last festival meeting has revived my hopes that our naval school will now meet with encouragement from noblemen and gentlemen who cannot fail to remember what the navy have done to protect them from invasion, plunder and devastation.

With such names as the earl of Devon and lord Yarborough our advocates, we may expect the host of naval officers who have not subscribed will come forward to a man, and make up for lost time by a very handsome subscription. It would be invidious in me or could mention names high up in the service, and well able to contribute, who have never subscribed one shilling, sheltering themselves under the futile pretext that such an establishment was uncalled for; to those men I would say memo mortuorum omnibus horis sapit.

In return for the general refusal of the dukes of the empire, to support the school, I wish the next time the country is in danger they may all pass a winter off Brest, with a batch of them at watch and watch; then they would see and feel what we poor sailors undergo. A thousand pounds from each of the potent nobles would affect their pockets much less than my humble donation. I live in hopes that they will yet follow the duke of Bedford's example, and pone dustum. Fearful I may suddenly slip my wind, and in the hurry of departure forget to order (my bankers, Messrs. Coutts, & co.) £100 to be set aside as my last effort to maintain the credit of the naval school, that always has had my fervent prayers for its success, you have herewith the necessary document. Please, when cashed, to hand the amount to my friend, sir Edward Codington, for and on account of the institution.

I am, &c. ISAAC COFFIN, admiral.
P. S. I may now exclaim with the Greenwich pensioner, "Then put up my tarpanlin jacket, sing, fiddle and dance to my grave."

THE THIRTEEN STRIPES. The Nantucket Inquirer published the following article from a London periodical of 1753, as corroborative evidence of an often asserted fact, that the first vessel which displayed our national flag on the waters of Great Britain was a Nantucket ship.

The ship Bedford, captain Moores, belonging to Massachusetts, arrived in the Downs the 30 of February, passed Gravesend the 4th, and was reported at the custom-house the 5th instant. She was not allowed regular entry until some consultation had taken place between the commissioners of the customs and the lords of council, on account of the many acts of parliament yet in force against the rebels in America. She is loaded with 487 bolls of whale oil, is American built, manned wholly by American seamen, wears the rebel colors and belongs to the island of Nantucket, in Massachusetts. This is the first vessel which displayed the thirteen rebellious stripes in any British port. The vessel is at Horseydown, a little below the tower, and is intended immediately to return to New England.

DONALD MACLEOD, ESQ. It will be seen by the following from the New York Times that Donald MacLeod, esq. late of Washington city, has purchased an interest in that paper, and will hereafter be its principal editor. Mr. Mac L. is a bold and vigorous writer, and we sincerely hope that his career may be pleasant and profitable.

"We have the pleasure of announcing to our friends and readers, that Mr. Donald MacLeod has become a proprietor in the establishment of the New York Times and Commercial Intelligencer.—The principal charge of the editorial department will hereafter devolve on Mr. MacLeod, who is a gentleman of experience in the business he has undertaken. The political character of the paper will remain unchanged, and the commercial and news departments will continue to be kept up with vigor.

"To our numerous friends and readers we feel grateful for the support they have given to the Times, and shall endeavor to merit increased patronage.
"Mr. MacLeod will enter on the discharge of his duties to-morrow."

THE LATE COMMODORE PERRY. It is stated in the New York Star, that the Rhode Island Historical Society, at their recent annual meeting, adopted, without a dissenting vote, a resolution which has for its object to vindicate the truth of history in relation to the celebrated victory achieved by the late commodore Perry, on Lake Erie. The merits of that heroic commander on that occasion, have been drawn into question, by several writers on American history, and it is due to the character of his native state, to protect from every injury his well earned fame.

PRIDE OF BIRTH. Catherine, duchess of Buckingham, natural daughter of James the second by the countess of Dorchester, was so proud of her birth that she would never go to Versailles, because they would not give her the rank of princess of the blood. At Rome, whither she went two or three times to see her brother, she had a box at the opera distinguished like those of crowned heads. She not only regulated the ceremony of her own burial, and dressed up the waxen figure of herself for Westminster Abbey, but had shown the same insensible pride on the death of her only son, dressing his figure, and sending messages to her friends that if they had a mind to see him lie in state, she would carry them in conveniently by the back door. She set to the old duchess of Marlborough to borrow the triumph car that had carried the duke's body. "Sarah, as mad and as proud as herself, sent her word that it had carried my lord Marlborough, and should never be profaned by any other corpse." The duchess of Buckingham, to mortify her, sent her word that "she had spoken to her undertaker, and he agreed to make a finer one for twenty pounds." When very ill, she sent for Mr. Anstis, and settled all the ceremonial of her funeral; and, fearing she should die before all the pomp was sent home, said—"Why don't they send the canopy for me to see? let them send it, though all the tassels are not finished."—And she made her attendants vow that, if she should be senseless, they would not sit down in the room before she was dead.

ANOTHER HERO GONE. Jonathan Mason, a soldier of the revolution, recently died in New Hampshire, at the age of 74 years. It is stated that he was once taken prisoner, and that being brought before general Burgoyne, that officer questioned him as follows:

"Well my lad, what do you think of yourself now?"

"Same as I always did."

"What do you think of being a prisoner?"

"Why, I think that you and all your men will be in the same fix in three weeks."

"All the yankees in America can't make me a prisoner of war."

"You'll see."

In three weeks, sure enough, Burgoyne and all his men fell into the hands of the yankees.

FORTUNE OF AN EMIGRANT. We find the following in a late New York paper, every word of which is true:

"Among the passengers who left New York for England, in the Great Western, we perceive the name of Mr. Francis Hall, one of the editors of the Commercial Advertiser. The history of that gentleman's career is an admirable exemplification of the reward which sterling merit and persevering industry are sure to obtain in this country. He came to America when a boy of 15 years of age, a steerage passenger, and obtained employment as a carrier boy of the Advertiser. From that station he was promoted to the office of "packer." Next he became clerk, and afterwards part proprietor of the establishment. Now he is one of the principal owners of that lucrative concern, and has amassed an independent fortune. The exile who came to America a poor boy in the steerage of a packet ship, returns to his native land in the luxurious cabin of a steam ship, with honors and wealth acquired by his own industry."

PHILADELPHIA, as it was laid out by the wise founder would have been truly a surpassingly beautiful city at this day, had its plan not been set aside by subsequent legislators. Of all the changes made in the original plot, there is but one for the better. William Penn designed a street, now so called, as the main thoroughfare of the city between the Delaware and the Schuylkill, and named it Broad street. The street now so called was afterwards determined upon as the dividing line, and we think judiciously, as it is higher ground. Here, however, all compliments to the founder's successors must cease. He designed several public squares, large, and well situated, which have been long covered with houses. No lanes or alleys were in any part of his plan; now the number and narrowness of them are on many accounts exceptional. Above all, the most tasteful of the primitive designs of Philadelphia has been ruthlessly subverted. Penn laid out the wharves or landing, without a house east of Front street.

He intended that the entire bank of the river in front of the city should be left unoccupied by buildings of any description, and being planted with trees, 'should form a wide and shaded promenade, extending from the most southern to the most northern point. But after his death merchants began to invade the sacred ground. The provincial legislature at first granted permission to them to build houses upon the river bank, the tops of which should not be higher than the level of Front street. By degrees further innovations were made, until the whole space was covered with buildings, and with a mean, narrow and unhealthy street dividing them along the line of the river.

It cannot be pretended that ample room and verge enough could not have been found west of Front street for all the immediate or prospective business of the city. To have stored merchandise a few yards higher up could not have injured it, and sail lofts, shop-stops, and sailor boarding houses could have flourished equally well, removed to an equal distance. In these days of brick and mortar, with the theodometer at 100, and the sun blazing upon the red pavement, the citizen confined to the limits of Philadelphia, may at leisure lament the folly of his ancestors, who destroyed the beautiful plans of good old WILLIAM PENN. [Nat. Gaz.]

SABBATH SCHOOLS IN LOWELL. A writer in the Lowell Courier makes the following statement.

There are now in the city fourteen regularly organized religious societies, beside one or two others quite recently established. Ten of these societies constitute a Sabbath school union. The third annual report was made on the fourth of the present month, and it has been published within a few days I derive from it the following facts. The number of scholars connected with the ten schools, at the time of making the report, was 4,936, and the number of teachers was 433, making an aggregate of 5,369. The number who joined the school during the year, was 3,770, the number who left was 3,129. There were three quarters of the scholars are females. A large proportion of the latter are over 15 years of age, and consist of girls employed in the mills. More than five hundred of these scholars have, during the last year become personally interested in practical piety, and more than six hundred have joined themselves to the several churches. Now, let it be borne in mind, that there are four or five other Sunday schools in the city, some of which are large and flourishing, not included in this statement. Let it be borne in mind, too, that a great proportion of these scholars are the factory girls, and furthermore, that these most gratifying results, just given, have nothing in them extraordinary—they are only the common, ordinary results of several of the past years. There has been no unusual excitement, no noise, no commotion. Silently, quietly, unobtrusively, from Sabbath to Sabbath, in these little nurseries of truth, duty and religion, has the good seed been sowing and springing up—watered by the dews and warmed by smiles of heaven—to everlasting.

I said, after making some statements in relation to the rate of mortality during certain years, among our manufacturing population, that these results could hardly find a parallel in medical statistics. I now ask, and I trust that I may do so without any vain boasting or presumption, whether the moral or religious statistics of any part of moral and religious New England can furnish more gratifying results than those which I have just given. Let us look at them once more. In a population of about 20,000 souls—some what less, probably, than this—there are fifteen religious societies, ten of which have connected with their Sunday schools, in the capacities of teachers or scholars, more than five thousand individuals. If to these we now add the scholars and teachers in the remaining schools, we shall have an aggregate of more than six thousand souls, connected with one third of the entire population, connected with the Sunday schools. This is no place for invidious comparisons, and I will not venture but I may speak with some confidence, I think, whether these facts are very compatible with the existence of a corrupt, debased, licentious and morally deteriorating population.

MIRACULOUS ESCAPE.—A CHILD RESCUED FROM A PANTHER! Last Saturday forenoon, Mr. James Rainey and wife, who live about 9 miles east of this village, in the town of Watson, set out home on business, leaving their house in charge of their oldest child, a girl aged 12 years. Near noon the girl heard an infant, aged 14 months, who had been laid while asleep on a bed in an adjoining bed room, utter a horrid scream, upon which she immediately ran to its relief, and imagine her feelings upon opening the door, to see a panther with the babe in its mouth, leaping from an open window immediately over the bed! But she, like a true heroine, sprang upon the bed and then out of the window, screaming at the height of her voice, and upon being joined by the other children about the house, pursued the panther at her utmost speed. They followed it about forty rods to a pair of bars which separated the clearing from the forest, at which place the girl states that she, approached to within 15 or 20 feet of the panther, when it relinquished its hold of the child, leapt the bars and made its way into the woods. The infant was picked up almost strangled from its rapid movement through the grass and sand, which had filled its mouth and eyes, but soon recovered, and is now well, save a few scratches over its body, which have the appearance of having been made by the panther's teeth. These marks are very plain, and there are several blood-blisters raised where the teeth in slipping came in contact. The girl states that the panther dropped the child once before arriving at the fence, and it is supposed the giving away of the clothing was the cause, as they were much torn.

We have the above particulars from unquestionable authority, and the probability of the story will not be questioned, when it is known that the immense forest east of the river is inhabited by panthers, and that at this season of the year they frequently are the personification of famine itself, which fact accounts for its approaching the dwelling, the tardiness of its movements, and its inability to leap the bars with its prey in its mouth, as we understand it made two ineffectual efforts before giving it up.

HISTORY. From the Virginia Advocate, Messrs. Editors: The Richmond Whig and National Intelligencer, with I know not how many papers besides, have lately published a letter purporting to be from John Adams to some male friend, (commencing, "Dear sir,") and dated July 4th, 1776, mentioning the adoption of the great act of independence, and predicting the glory which, through future times, would enircle the annual returns of that day.

Now, it happens that the letter in question was addressed to no man; but to the WIFE of Mr. Adams. That lady, than whom none that ever lived felt deserved to be the wife of such a patriot, shared most intimately all the hopes, knowledge and counsels of her brave and virtuous husband. No sage or hero of the times had a wiser mind, or a madder heart. It was this character of her, which made Mr. Adams address her in a style not usual towards women, but such as one statesman would employ towards another, his equal, and bosom friend. And it was no doubt this style which misled some newspaper editors, several years ago, into the error now committed by the Intelligencer and Whig, for it does not begin with them.

You will find the true version of the letter on page 329 of Niles' valuable book of documents called "Principles and Acts of the Revolution," which I have now before me. Mr. Niles took it from a Boston paper, to which it was communicated by the late Judge Rufus Dawes, who had received it, he says, from the hands of Mr. Adams himself. The true date of the letter is July 3d—not the 4th—and it is the 2d of July (when the resolve to declare independence was finally adopted) that Mr. Adams says "will be a memorable epocha in the history of America."

Of this day, (the 2d of July), Mr. Adams goes on to say—

"I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated as the day of our deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp, shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires and illuminations, from one end of the continent to the other, from this time forward for ever.

"You will think me" (he continues) "transported with enthusiasm; but I am not. I am well aware of the toil, and blood, and treasure that it will cost us to maintain this declaration, and support and defend these states. Yet, through all the gloom, I can see the rays of light and glory. I can see that the end is more than worth all the means, and that posterity will triumph, although you and I may rue it—which I hope we shall not."

These passages, and others from the same letter, are woven by Mr. Webster into the noble speech which, in his eulogy on Adams and Jefferson, he imagines to have been uttered by the former in support of the Declaration of Independence. By a singular accumulation of blunders, that speech has, in several instances, been copied into newspapers (and Massachusetts newspapers too) as a real one of John Adams, and not as a mere felicity of Mr. Webster's imagination.

It seems to me, Messrs. Editors, that these mistakes are worth correcting; especially that which defrauds Mrs. Adams of the high place belonging to her in history, as the partner of a pure and great patriot's public plans, no less than of his tender affections. L.

THE CASE OF JACOB RIDGWAY AND OTHERS. At Philadelphia, the court of common pleas, before which, under a writ of habeas corpus, the evidence of an alleged conspiracy by Jacob Ridgway, Daniel Mann and T. M. Lloyd, to defraud the creditors of the latter, was examined, have unanimously discharged Mr. Ridgway. The opinion of the court was delivered by Judge Randall. We take the occasion again to remark briefly upon the conduct of certain journals in cases of this kind. All the ex-parte testimony offered before the mayor during the examination, which resulted in his binding over the parties above named on a charge of conspiracy, was spread before the public, without their having the privilege of explaining or contradicting it, and their characters, which should not have suffered in such a case, any taint until a verdict by a jury should have proved them guilty, were thus exposed to all the imputations attendant upon an actual conviction. For our own part, we cannot, having in view this wrong done to a citizen, who is now discharged as wholly innocent, after a fair investigation of the case, discover any public good which may be supposed to balance the private injury which may be inflicted in this manner. We have seen in numerous journals published at a distance, mention of the "conspiracy," and of the parties, as if proven guilty. The presses which caused this injustice cannot now repair it, but it should at least be a lesson for their future consideration.

CATTLE AND RAILWAYS. A complete revolution is being made in the mode by which the supplies exhibited at Smithfield cattle market for sale are received. Previously to the formation of railroads, the whole of the stock—with the exception of the calves from Essex, which, from time immemorial, have been conveyed by wagons—arrived at the above market by drift; but now the case is quite different. Since the opening of the Southampton line, all the most extensive graziers in the Isle of Wight have transmitted their lambs by this conveyance. By the Great Western and Birmingham roads the receipts have been large; but by far greater things are expected, immediately the northern and eastern railway (or Cambridge line) is completed, since a direct conveyance will be secured from our grazing districts. On an accurate calculation we find but little, if any, difference exists between the sums charged by the railway companies and those by the drovers; but when the excellent condition in which the stock arrives is taken into consideration, every disinterested person must admit that the transmission by railway is advantageous both to the seller and purchaser—the former receiving, in many instances, higher rates than those whose stock has been driven to market, the latter being far less liable to be deceived in the weighing qualities, since it is a well known fact, that all kinds of stock, which travel far, lose a considerable portion of their internal fat. NAVIGATION OF THE RIO GRANDE. The Extract of a letter dated, Metamoros, June 22. "The United States sloop of war Vandalia, captain Levy, is now at anchor off the mouth of the Rio Bravo del Norte, having arrived there on the 19th from Pensacola, whence she sailed on the 8th instant. Captain Levy and some other of the ship's officers are now in this place, having come up the river with a boat's crew of 12 men. Captain Levy informs me that the ascent was not effected without much tugging and tracking, and some wading. This is the first time a national boat of the United States has ever accomplished this feat, (which occupied two days), or visited Metamoros—The well known perseverance and energy of captain Levy, herein exemplified, deserve commendation, particularly when we consider the meagre which his presence gives to Mexicans of the vigilance of our government in protecting the rights of its merchants and citizens here, against the capacious officers and rapacious people of a needy government. Captain Levy speaks of the Rio Grande as one of bold majestic aspect, and having a channel of from fourteen to twenty or more feet in depth, with its banks most perpendicular. It is thought to be easily navigated by steam. The distance, however, from the sea to this place, is about ninety miles by the river, though by the road it is but about thirty-six miles."

FROM NORTHEASTERN TEXAS.

By a gentleman arrived yesterday from Nacogdoches, Texas, via Natchitoches and Red River, we learn that considerable excitement prevails in the neighborhood of St. Augustine and Nacogdoches, in relation to the hostile movement of Bowles, the Cherokee chief, who, it is feared, contemplates a hostile invasion. General Rusk had sent expresses in different directions for all the militia to turn out, and had already collected nearly one thousand men. His camp, when our informant left, was within two miles and a half of that of Bowles, and an engagement was hourly anticipated.

Bowles, in the meantime, was hourly receiving reinforcements from Arkansas, and the struggle was expected to be severe.

There is little doubt, in the neighborhood of Nacogdoches, that Bowles has an understanding with the Mexican authorities, and that he has been incited to this hostile movement by a promise of immense grants in Texas in case he succeeds, and that moreover the Mexicans have agreed to attack the western frontier in the vicinity of San Antonio or Goliad to instigate him still farther. We are anxiously looking for the results of the action near Fort Houston, at the forks of the Sabine and the Trinity, which must have taken place on the 13th or 14th instant, unless a treaty had been effected between the vice president of Texas and Bowles, of which there was little hopes.

The Kickapoos, a warlike and dangerous tribe, whose skill with the rifle is said to be as great as that of the Tennessees, Kentuckians or Texans, have joined Bowles, who is spoken of as shrewd, designing and ambitious chief, well educated, and perfectly conversant with the English language. The Texans desire no treaty with the Indians—all they want is a war of extermination, since they have learned the treachery of Bowles. The latter has always pretended to act a perfectly friendly part; but the interception of several letters lately, to the authorities of Mexico, has shown him in his true colors. [New Orleans Pic.]

LATER NEWS.

From the New Orleans Bee, July 29.

The following highly interesting letter to the editors of this paper was received yesterday by the steamer Velocipede, from Red River:

Natchitoches, July 29, 1859.

GENTLEMEN: Enclosed you will herewith receive an official report of an engagement which took place on the 15th inst. and a letter from gen. Rusk, dated the 17th instant, 75 miles northwest of Nacogdoches, Texas, between a large body of Cherokees, Caddoes, and other Indians, and the troops under the command of brig. gen. K. H. Douglass, from which it will be seen the enemy sustained a heavy loss.

Taken from the Red Lander, a newspaper at San Augustine, Texas, dated July 20, 1859.

Head quarter, San Carter, July 16, 1859.

To the hon. Sydney Johnson, secretary of war:

SIR: On yesterday the negotiation on the part of the commissioners having failed, under your order the whole force was put in motion towards the encampment of Bowles, on the Neches. Colonel Landrum crossed on the west side of the Neches, and marched up the river; the regiment under colonels Burleson and Rusk moved directly to the camp of Bowles.

Upon reaching it, it was found to be abandoned. Their trail was ascertained, and a rapid pursuit made. About six miles above their encampment, in the vicinity of the Delaware village, at the head of a prairie, they were discovered by the spy company, under captain J. Carter, and a detachment of 25 men from captain Todd's company, led by general Rusk. The enemy displayed from the point of a hill—gen. Rusk motioned to them to come on—they advanced and fired four or five times, and immediately occupied a thicket and ravine on the left.

As we advanced, the lines were immediately formed and the action became general. The ravine was instantly charged and danked on the left by colonel Hleson, and a part of his regiment; the rest of Burleson's regiment were led by lieutenant colonel Woodlee. A portion of general Rusk's regiment charged at the same time, and another portion took a position on a point of a hill to the right, and drove a party who attempted to flank us from that quarter; thus instantly driving the enemy from the ravine and thicket, leaving eighteen dead on the field, that have been found, and carrying off, as usual, their wounded, as was seen by our men.

Our loss was two killed, one wounded mortally, and five slightly, to wit: D. H. Rodgers, of captain Tipp's company; John Crane, of Harrison's company; H. P. Cronson, of same; Hooper, H. M. Smith, and Ball, of Burleson's command; James Anderson, of captain Lewis's company; Solomon Albright, of captain Vansickle's company; Geo. S. Daughter, of captain Box's company, slightly.

Col. Landrum was not able, having so much further to march, to participate in the engagement, but has been ordered to join this morning. All behaved so gallantly, that it would be invidious to particularize. The action commenced about half an hour before sunset, which prevented pursuit. Most of their baggage was captured, 3 kegs of powder, 250 lbs. of lead, and many horses, cattle, corn and other property. By order of

K. H. DOUGLASS,

Brigadier general commanding T. A. JAMES S. MAYFIELD, aid-de-camp.

A letter from general Rusk, dated 17th instant, has also just reached this place, in which the remarks: "We have had another engagement to-day with the Indians, who occupied a very strong position. The contest lasted an hour and a half, when we charged and drove them from their station, in which, however, they sustained considerable loss, the amount of which is not yet ascertained. Bowles was found among the dead.

"Their number was very considerable, I think 500 or 600. Our loss was 2 men killed and upwards of 20 wounded, amongst whom are my brother and major Augustine, of San Augustine county." We are happy to learn that every precaution has been taken to cut off the retreat of the enemy, and thereby prevent a protracted war. We shall anxiously await further intelligence from that quarter, and will endeavor to keep our readers promptly and correctly advised on this important subject.

AFFAIRS IN FLORIDA.

Tallahassee, July 17, 1859.

On Saturday night, between nine and ten o'clock, the family of Mr. Green Chairs—living about ten miles from town—were attacked by the Indians, and his wife and two children killed.

Mrs. Chairs was sitting by the table sewing, surrounded by her interesting family, consisting of her husband and six children. Mr. Chairs was rising on the bed, in the same room, when an Indian rifle was fired, and Mrs. C. fell dead from her chair. Mr. C. instantly sprang from the bed, blew out the candle, closed the door and windows, and seizing his gun took his stand, with the determination to kill one Indian at all hazards when they should attempt to enter the house. The Indians, however, approached the house in such a way as to be unseen by Mr. C. and proceeded to set fire to the dwelling and out-houses on the premises. Soon after the dwelling house caught fire, Mr. C. started four of the largest children out at the back door, and told them to escape to the next neighbor's; they did effect their escape, and were all saved; the eldest, however, a young lady about seventeen, was discovered by the Indians, who gave her chase, and were well nigh making her a victim; but she had taken the precaution, as she was leaving the house, to take with her a dark cloak, and when she found herself so closely pursued by the savages, she suddenly fell in the bushes, and, throwing this garment over her person, concealed herself from the keen eye of her ruthless pursuers. The Indians, she says, passed within three feet of her! This young lady's life was saved so narrowly as to make the blood run cold even at the thought; and it should not be forgotten that it is entirely attributable to her presence that it is entirely attributable to her presence of mind.

So rapid was the fire, and so great the consternation produced upon Mr. C. by the sudden death of his wife, that, in making his own flight from the house, he forgot his two youngest children—the one about two years old, and the other a babe of six months—and they were both burned to ashes! Information of this horrid transaction reached our city during the night, and our citizens were aroused by the beating of the drum, and the stirring preparations to go in pursuit of the foe. About sunrise, the "minute men," a mounted company under the command of capt. Hugh Fisher, started in pursuit; and, after visiting the scene of murder and outrage, took the trail of the Indians, and followed it some miles, when, owing to a very heavy rain which fell during their pursuit, they lost it, and were obliged to return. The minute men are still out scouring the country. [Star.]

Tallahassee, (Florida), July 27.

Two wagons, with an escort of eight men, left Fort Frank Brooke, Deadman's bay, on Monday morning last, and, after proceeding near half the distance to Fort Andrews, Henderson, the hospital steward, with five men, was fired on by a party of Indians from a hammock near the road. Henderson and Parks fell dead. The horse of another of the escort, being shot, fell, and entangled the leg of his rider in such manner as to prevent his rising. On the near approach of the Indians the horse rose; the rider, at the same time remounting, was borne off to the party and the three joined the wagons. One man, being sent back to Fort Frank Brooke, returned with a severely mutilated, his eyes dug out, his throat cut, and other disgusting outrages committed on his body. The body of Henderson had been removed, and could not be found. The enemy was trailed some distance without finding them. Scouts are still in pursuit.

St. Augustine, July 25.

The way the money goes.—A small schooner chartered by government at $600 a month, returned here on Friday from New Smyrna, a distance of 60 miles, having performed the voyage in the short space of thirty-nine days—the sixty miles out, was performed in thirty days. All humane persons will be pleased to learn that though the land road between this and Smyrna is unsafe, the anchorage is in many places excellent and fishing grounds delightful!

From one end of Florida to the other, we have heard the following story told, never contradicted, and therefore should not doubt it to be true. A little steamboat drawing 21 inches of water, was offered for sale to an officer of government on the west coast, at $5,000, and refused; but was taken into service, and retained about a year at three hundred dollars a day. Eighty odd thousand dollars have been paid for her hire, and about ten thousand more remains in dispute. [Herald.]

St. Augustine, July 27.

The following gentlemen of Florida have been instructed by his excellency gov. Call, to repair to Washington, and confer with the president, and urge on him the adoption of the necessary measures, not only for the defence of the country, but the successful prosecution of the war; honorable Charles Downing, his honor R. Randall, W. H. Brockenboro, esq. S. K. Walker, esq. col. G. S. Hawkins.

The hon. Charles Downing will leave for Washington on Wednesday next. [News.]

Extract of a letter to the editor of the Baltimore Patriot, dated St. Augustine, July 24.

In a former letter I ventured to suggest the opinion to you that the humbug treaty made by gen. Macomb with some common Indians would not be regarded by the Indians generally—that their regular chiefs and head men having been all removed or dead, the scattered vagabonds who remained for purposes of murder, rapine or revenge, could, and ought not to be treated with as if they were a regular nation, who could enforce and observe obligations. The Indians, I told you further, were out of ammunition, and were anxious for a truce for the purpose of laying in supplies for a renewal of the war. All my predictions, I fear, are about to be realized.

A week has now passed by after the time limited by the general for their removal to the southern boundary, but not one of them has gone! On the contrary they have given several strong indications of a settled purpose to remain and renew the massacres!

The negroes of Mr. Kingsley, on Drayton Island, about seventy miles from here on the St. John's river, have within a few days been driven off by a party of Indians, who took all their provisions, and informed them that they intended to renew the war at the next new moon!

THE YOUNG MEN'S CORRESPONDENCE WITH GOVERNOR SEWARD.

New York, July 20, 1839.

To his excellency governor Seward.

Sir: We have been appointed a committee of the general committee of whig young men of the city and county of New York, to communicate to your excellency the enclosed preamble and resolutions, which were adopted at their meeting of last evening. It is unnecessary for us to add any thing to the action of the committee, beyond the expression of our sincere acquiescence in the propriety of the course which has met with their unanimous approval.

With assurances of the most respectful consideration and attachment, we have the honor to be, your excellency's friends and servants,

JOHN O. SARGENT,
R. C. WETMORE,
JAS. F. FREEBORN,
JAS. H. LYLES,
JAMES R. WOOD,
HAMILTON FISH,
A. W. BRADFORD,
WM. TURNER.

In general committee of whig young men of N. York.
Friday, July 19, 1839.

The following preamble and resolution were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas, it has been stated in the official organ of the corporation, that a correspondence took place between a committee of the common council and governor Seward, having reference to the recent reception of the president, and that the letter of governor Seward, in reply to that of the committee, was of a 'disrespectful and abusive character,'

"And whereas, the committee of the common council, by their studied silence and by their omission to publish the correspondence in question, have countenanced and encouraged this statement of their official organ;

"And whereas, the members of this committee repose a confidence in the chief magistrate of the state, the first choice of the young men of New York, which assures them that he is incapable of doing any act unworthy the relations of his office or disrespectful towards the common council of this city or any portion of his constituents;

"Therefore, resolved, that a committee of eight, including the chairman of this committee, be appointed to communicate with governor Seward, and request a copy of the correspondence referred to for the press, that it may be submitted to that judgment of the people, which is the only true test of public measures and public men."

Albany, July 26, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: I am instructed by the governor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication to him of the 20th ult. Personally he has no motive for desiring the publication or suppression of the correspondence to which it refers. Without regard to the reasons assigned by the committee for their request, he does not feel himself at liberty to withhold information relative to his official conduct, where it is called for by a respectable number of his fellow citizens, whether their views concur with, or differ from his own.

A copy of the correspondence is therefore transmitted.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
SAML. BLATCHFORD, private secretary.
John O. Sargent, R. C. Wetmore, Jas. F. Freeborn, Jas. Hyllyer, James R. Wood, Hamilton Fish, A. W. Bradford, Wm. Turner, esqrs.

(COPY).

June 29, 1839.

Sir: The committee of the common council of the city of New York, appointed to make suitable arrangements for the reception of the president of the United States, respectfully invite yourself and military family to participate with them and their fellow citizens in his reception, on the 2d July next, to meet this committee at the City Hall, at 9½ o'clock, A. M. to proceed on board the steamboat, to meet him at Jersey City. By order of the committee.
THOS. G. TALMADGE, Clk'n.
To his excellency governor Seward.

(COPY).

Albany, June 30, 1839.

Sir: I have this evening received your letter of yesterday, in which, as chairman of a committee of the common council of the city of New York, you invite me to participate with the common council and their fellow-citizens in the reception of the president of the United States in that city.

I might perhaps be content with declining to accept the invitation upon the ground of other engagements and duties which will not permit me to be absent from this place. But as this would leave me liable to be misapprehended, I am obliged to add an explanation. I desire to do so without disrespect to the president, and with the highest respect for the common council.

Should the chief magistrate of the union favor the place of my residence with a visit, or should my duty call me into his vicinity, I should, with cheerfulness and pleasure pay him all the respect called for by his public station or properly due from mine. Nor do I intend to say, or imply that the demonstrations of respect proposed by the common council are not justly due to him, both in his public and personal character.

I cannot consider the question of acceptance of the invitation tendered to me without reference to the public station I have the honor to hold; nor can I have misunderstood my fellow-citizens so much, as not to know that, whatever other circumstances may have moved their favor towards me, every public demonstration of their confidence I have had the honor to receive during my life, has proceeded in some measure upon the ground of my avowed disapprobation of his political character and his public policy. By no means intending to express a doubt of the sincerity of his motives, and entertaining, as is most just, entire confidence in the purity and disinterestedness of the large body of my fellow citizens who admire his character and approve his measures, I cannot forget, in deference to his elevated station, that with a desire no less sincere than his to advance the best interests of the country, I have regarded his policy and measures as injurious to the prosperity and welfare of his native state, and that the state has honored me for firmly and frankly maintaining these opinions.

Nor can I forget, that in carrying out the policy which has crowned, with irreparable honor, the name of one who was his and my most illustrious predecessor in the station assigned to me,—a policy which is destined to extend the fame, enhance the wealth, exalt the condition, and immeasurably increase the happiness of the people of this state, the state administration at every step encounters an uncompromising hostility, proceeding from that powerful administration of which the president of the United States is the chief. While on the one hand the dictates of my judgment, and the conscientious desire to discharge faithfully my official obligations, enforce my adherence to that policy, and while on the other there exists no ground to anticipate an abatement of that hostility, it is manifest that my relation to the president can undergo no change. It would at any time, and under any circumstances, be an extraordinary demonstration of respect on the part of the chief magistrate of this state towards any public functionary, were he to leave his duties at the capital to receive such functionary in your city; and such a demonstration, while those relations exist, would afford evidence of inconsistency and insincerity.

I could have wished, either that the invitation of the committee had been informally made, or had been communicated to me on an earlier day, so that I might have advised its withdrawal; and thus the necessity for this explanation would have been avoided. But I cannot bring myself to regret that I am obliged to decline the invitation. Our republican institutions can never be more safe than when the discussion of public measures, and of the character of public men, is so vigorous as to bring into the offices of the general and state governments individuals whose relations prevent the possibility of combination between them to perpetuate power conferred only for the public good.

I pray you to express to the committee my acknowledgments for this mark of their attention, with the assurance of my sincere respect towards the common council, and my ardent desire for the prosperity of the city over which they preside, and whose welfare is identified with that of the state and the union. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Thomas G. Talmadge, esq. Chairman com. of the common council of N. Y.

BANKS, CURRENCY, &c.

Bank of the United States in New York. The following statement, made according to law, by the association banking under the title of the Bank of the United States in New York, will excite some curiosity, which it will not, nevertheless, gratify. A full statement of the affairs of the bank of the U. S. the act entitled, "an act to authorise the business of banking," passed April 18, 1838, on the first Monday of July, 1839.

First. The amount of capital stock paid in $200,500 00

Second. Nothing under this head.
Third. The shares of stock held by said association absolutely, or as collateral security, on the said first Monday of July, 1839, were, viz:

1st. Stock held absolutely—
 Stock of the State of Michigan, lodged with the comptroller as security for circulating notes, $200,000 00

2d. Stock held as collateral security—
 Eight shares in the capital stock of the Bank of the United States, valued at $100 per share par, $800 00

Fourth. Amount of debts due to the association on the said first Monday of July, 1839, specifying such as are due from moneyed or other corporations or associations, and also specifying the amount secured by bond and mortgage, or judgment, and the amount which ought to be included in the computation of losses:—

1st. Debts due from moneyed corporations or associations—
 Balance due by sundry banks, being cash with said banks to the credit of this association, $1,745,328 47

2d. None.

3d. Debts in judgment, supposed collectable, 518 59
 “ “ supposed not collectable, 190 93

4th. Other debts:—
 Bills and notes discounted, supposed collectable, 1,408,999 27
 Amount over due, not in suit, supposed collectable, 4,671 31
 Amount due from individual over-drawts, 610 94
 Apparent amount, $17,786 54
 Payable at notice, 17,175 60
 Cash on hand, 2,801,031 96

5th. Losses:—
 The amount of debts which ought to be included in the computation of losses, 1,490 93

Fifth. The amount of debts due by this association on the first Monday of July, 1839:—
 Amount payable on demand, $5,971,570 20
 Of which is due to corporations and associations, 4,447,033 52

Sixth. The amount of claims against the association not acknowledged by it as debts, on the said first Monday of July, 1839, none.

Seventh. The amount of bills, notes or other evidences of debt, issued by this association, is in circulating notes of the denomination of five dollars, 124,000 00

Eighth. No dividends have been declared on this association.

Ninth. The average amount of each month during the six months preceding this statement of debts due to this association, (including cash), was,
 For the month of January, $3,842,021 08
 February, 3,608,187 35
 March, 3,809,576 47
 April, 4,040,375 20
 May, 5,069,545 13
 June, 5,521,082 20

The average amount in each month, during the same period of debts due from this association, was,
 For the month of January, $3,842,021 08
 February, 3,608,187 35
 March, 3,809,576 47
 April, 4,040,375 20
 May, 5,069,545 13
 June, 5,521,082 20

The average amount of specie possessed by this association during the same period, was,
 For the month of January, $132,601 05
 February, 215,381 43
 March, 183,085 08
 April, 188,550 37
 May, 157,927 29
 June, 532,736 34

The amount of notes issued by this association and put in circulation as money and outstanding against it on the first day of each of the preceding six months was as follows:—
 Issues for the month of January, $10,000 00
 February, 10,000 00
 March, 10,000 00
 April, 20,000 00
 May, 14,000 00
 June, 14,000 00

Circulation first January, 45,240 00
 “ February, 53,900 00
 “ March, 52,990 00
 “ April, 86,970 00
 “ May, 100,935 00
 “ June, 97,325 00

Tenth. Nothing under this head.

Eleventh. No increase has taken place in the capital of this association during the last six months.

No persons have become parties to the association since the last statement to the comptroller.

M. Robinson, esq. has withdrawn from the association.

State of New York, city of New York, ss.—Thomas H. Young, cashier of the Bank of the United States in New York, being duly affirmed, deposes and saith, that the facts set forth in the foregoing statement are true to the best of his knowledge, information and belief. T. H. YOUNG, cashier.

Affirmed and subscribed to before me, this 24th day of July, 1839.

JOSEPH STRONG, com. of deeds.

The New York Transcript observes—“The conduct of the banks during the last year has been extremely prudent, and no danger need or can be apprehended for them. We owe much of the distress of the present year to the numerous speculations in cotton and flour, and we do humbly hope, that it may prove a salutary lesson.”

The State Bank of Alabama, at Tuscaloosa, received $110,000 in specie on the 23d ult.

Bank of Kentucky.—The Louisville Journal says, “by the statement of the condition of the Bank of Kentucky, on the 30th June, it appears that her specie at that time amounted to $635,850. On the 1st of January last, she had on hand $642,776 36 in specie; showing a decrease in that period of $6,925 39. On the 1st of January her circulation was $2,781,512, and on the 1st of June $2,323,299; showing a decrease in her circulation of $458,313.”

The Harrisburg Reporter states that the Pennsylvania 5 per cent. loan of $1,150,000, the period for receiving offers for which was closed on Thursday last, was not taken, not a bid having been received. The $2,000,000 loan, authorised by the internal improvement act, remains open until the 24th instant.

Books for the subscription of stock in the Lynchburg and Tennessee rail road are to be opened on the 17th August.

It is stated that on the 1st of July, the Bank of Missouri had in specie $1,631,714; in circulation, $323,860; in bills discounted, $1,636,575; and she owed the U. S. $1,085,755. This is emphatically a pet bank.

Mr. Smith, president of the Bank of Missouri, is now in London, whither he went to sell $2,000,000 in Missouri bonds, being part of the subscription of the state to the bank, and also $1,500,000 in Trust Fund bonds.

New York banking law.—The question of the constitutionality of the law passed last year by the legislature of New York, to authorise the business of banking, was argued in a case pending before the supreme court at Utica last week. The question came up on a general demurrer to the declaration in a suit brought by the president of the bank of Central New York, against one of its debtors.—The decision of the court is not yet known.

The following is an estimate of the specie taken to Europe by the steam and packet ships, which sailed from New York on the 1st inst:—

Great Western,	$450,000
British Queen,	300,000
Baltimore, for Havre,	225,000

The Journal of Commerce says, the banks were called on for large sums, which they paid promptly and without complaining, or seeming to consider the calls unkind or any thing else than fair business transactions.

Banking capital of Pennsylvania.—By a recent report to the legislature upon the subject, the entire banking capital of the state is set down at fifty-seven millions four hundred and fifty thousand dollars! more than one-half of which is held by the miscalled Bank of the United States! Think of that, and remember the traitors to democracy through whom it was obtained. [Philadelphia Times.

The subjoined bill, entitled an act to prescribe the mode of application, for banks, in Pennsylvania, has passed both branches of the legislature and is a law.

Whereas, by the twenty-fifth section of the first article of the amended constitution, it is provided that no corporate body shall hereafter be created, renewed, or extended, with banking or discounting privileges, without six months previous public notice of the application for the same, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law. Therefore,

Section 1. Be it enacted by the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in general assembly met, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that whenever any citizen, or association of citizens, of this commonwealth, intend to make application to the legislature, for the creation, renewal, or extension of any corporate body, with banking or discounting privileges, it shall be their duty to cause a notice of such intended application to be advertised in one paper printed in Harrisburg, and two newspapers printed in the county, in which such corporate body is, or is intended to be located, at least once a week in each paper, for six months before the meeting of the then next legislature; and the notice of such application shall specify, the name and style, or the intended name and style, the location or intended location, and the amount of capital or intended amount of capital, of such corporate body, and in the case of the renewal or extension of any such corporate body, such notice shall also specify the amount of increase of capital, if any increase be intended.—Provided, That if there be only one paper printed in the county in which such corporate body is, or is intended to be located, the publication of such notice in one paper shall be deemed sufficient.

Banks in Pennsylvania. Fourteen applications for new banks and the renewal of old charters, are advertised in the Harrisburg papers—should these applications meet the favorable consideration of the legislature, the banking capital of the state would be increased about five millions of dollars.

At a convention of the banks of Ohio, held at Columbus on the 26th ult. pursuant to previous notice, James Hall, esq. of Cincinnati, was chosen president, and T. P. Handy, and E. F. Drake, secretaries.

The object of the convention having been stated, it was moved,

That a committee, consisting of Messrs. Fosdick, T. P. Handy, Creed, McCoy, Drake, Bentley and Hall, be appointed to take into consideration the general objects of the convention, the present condition of exchanges as existing among the banks in the different parts of the state, and report thereon; which report, after having been duly discussed and amended, was unanimously adopted, viz:—

1. Resolved, That we consider the practice of meeting in convention as often as once a year, for the purpose of interchanging opinions and producing harmony of operation between the respective banks of Ohio, highly conducive to the advantages of the banks and the public, and that we recommend the continuance of the same.

2. Resolved, That the condition of the banks of Ohio, as compared with those of other states, is such as to warrant the most entire confidence in each other, and on the part of the public, and that we recommend to our respective institutions, that they persevere in the same cautious and safe policy, by which the Ohio banks have heretofore maintained their credit.

3. Resolved, That believing as we do, that bank are established for the public good, and can exist only in the observance of such policy as shall benefit the public and secure confidence, we recommend frequent and frank disclosures between banks, and by the banks to the public, in regard to their condition and business.

4. Resolved, That Ohio being a great agricultural and productive state, and the prosperity of the banks depending on that of the people, we recommend that the separate and united exertions of the banks be used, in good faith, to furnish exchange at low rates and a sound paper currency, to facilitate the sales and transmission to market of the produce of our soil.

On motion,
 Resolved, That the proceedings of this convention be printed under direction of Messrs. McCoy and Dehler.

The convention then adjourned to meet at Columbus on the third Wednesday of June, 1840, or sooner, if it shall be deemed necessary, and that the banks of Ohio are earnestly solicited to send delegates to such convention.

The Bank of the United States.—We learn that the Bank of the United States has declined receiving the deposits of all brokers. An extraordinary move this, and calculated to be attended by no very agreeable consequences. We may mention that since the establishment of the branch of the U. S. in New York, the notes of the institution have been kept at par in that city. Hence the brokers made use of them very freely as remittances to their New York correspondents. Now, however, under the new arrangement, they will be compelled to forward specie—which specie, they must obtain from the Philadelphia banks. The result will be to drain our banks to a considerable extent, for the benefit of New York. [Dicknell's Reporter.

Vicksburg Bank.—The committee of fifteen, lately appointed at Philadelphia by the stockholders of the above institution, made their report on Tuesday, and gave their entire approval of the report made some time since by Messrs. Carpenter and Mitchell, commissioners sent to Vicksburg to examine into the affairs of the institution. They recommended to the stockholders and board of directors, the appointment of David Conyngham, as president, and John A. Barclay, of Philadelphia, as assistant cashier, which was unanimously approved by the stockholders. [Phil. Herald.]

Rate of interest in England. The Baltimore Transcript publishes the following table, showing the rates of interest paid in Great Britain previous to 1714:

On £100	Per cent.	per annum.
In 1255	£50	0s. 0d.
1265	43	6 8
1270 to 1307	45	0 0
1422 to 1470	15	0 0
1545 restricted to	10	0 0
1553 to 1558	12	0 0
1571 restricted to	10	0 0
1574 to 1604—about	9	16 0
1625 reduced to	8	0 0
1645 to 1660	6	6 0
1660 to 1690	7	6 0
1690 to 1697	8	0 0
1697 to 1706	6	0 0
1714 reduced to	5	0 0

In the reign of Henry VIII, the rate was fixed by act of parliament at 10 per cent. In 1553 an act was passed prohibiting the taking of any interest whatever, but it was soon after repealed. In 1625 the rate was reduced to 8 per cent. for 1751 to 6 per cent. and 1714 to 5 per cent. Since that time the Bank of England has been allowed to charge 5 per cent. and within a few years it has been allowed under certain circumstances to charge 6 per cent.

It will thus be seen that the Bank of England is now charging a higher rate than at any time for the last 125 years.

STEAMBOAT STATISTICS.

From the New York Journal of Commerce.

By a notice issued from the office of H. B. M. privy council for trade, on the 2d of January last, capt. Pringle, of the royal engineers, and Josiah Sparks, esq. civil engineer, were appointed a committee to institute an inquiry into the number, nature, and causes of steamboat accidents, and the means of preventing their recurrence. Accepting the appointment, these gentlemen immediately entered upon the task assigned them, and on the 20th of May, submitted an elaborate report to the board from which they received their commission. On the 31st of the same month it was laid before the house of commons, and ordered to be printed.

Through the kindness of Wm. C. Redfield, esq. who has received an early copy of this important document, we are enabled to state some of the leading facts which it embodies. It makes a volume of 198 pages, besides several sheets of diagrams.

It appears from this report, that the whole number of steam vessels in Great Britain and Ireland at the commencement of the present year, including 83 not registered, was 760 with an aggregate tonnage of 140,718 tons, and an aggregate power of 56,490 horse power. In the isles of Guernsey, Jersey and Man, there were (in 1837) 6 steamers, with an aggregate of 1,450 tons, and 600 horse power; and in the British plantations, (in 1837) 41 steamers, with an aggregate of 15,661 tons, and 6,160 horse power, making a total, in the United Kingdom and its dependencies, of 810 steamers, with an aggregate of 157,840 tons, and 62,250 horse power. This is exclusive of government steamers. The tonnage is not the "custom house tonnage," but the real tonnage, as computed, including the tonnage of the engine room, which is not entered at the custom house.

According to secretary Woodbury's report, submitted to congress on the 13th of December last, the number of steamboats in the United States was about 800, with an aggregate tonnage of 160,000, and 57,019 horse power.

Hence it would seem that the steamboat tonnage of the United Kingdom and its dependencies, is about exactly equal to that of the United States. We had supposed it was a good deal less; and are not sure now but it is. If however the mode of computing tonnage is the same, the tonnage of the two countries is equal within a small fraction. We observe that of 677 British steamers registered, 256 averaged 60 tons each, including engine room—145 averaged 122 tons each—81 do. 211 tons—63 do. 287 tons—76 do. 361 tons—41 do. 530 tons—10 do. 769 tons—one 1,340 tons, and one 1,855 tons.

We come now to the more immediate object of the report. The general impression in this country is, that there are comparatively very few steamboat accidents in England; but we find from the list detailed by the committee, who speak of it as necessarily incomplete, that within the last ten years, or thereabouts, no less than 92 British steamers have met with disasters, attended with the loss of 634 lives.* Of these 92 vessels, 40 were wrecked, foundered, or in imminent peril; 23 suffered by explosions of boilers; 17 by fire; and 12 by collisions. The greatest ascertained number of lives lost at any one time was 119, by the wreck of the Rothsay Castle; greatest number at one time by collision, 62; do. by explosion 24; do. by fire 2.

According to Mr. Secretary Woodbury's report, the number of steamboats in the United States which have met with disasters of one kind or other, is about 228; viz: about 99 by explosions, collisions, &c.; 25 by shipwreck or collision; 28 by fire; 52 by snags and sawyers; and 24 by causes unknown. Whole number of lives lost, about 2,000. Mr. Woodbury ascertained the loss of 1,676, besides which 416 persons were wounded. The greatest loss of life on any one occasion, was in consequence of the collision and sinking of the Monmouth, in 1837, on the Mississippi, causing the death of about 300 persons, chiefly Indians. By the explosion of the Oronoco, in 1837, on the same river, 130 or more lives were lost; and by that of the Moselle, at Cincinnati, 100 to 120. By the shipwreck of the Home, on the coast of North Carolina, in 1837, about 200 persons perished, and 130 by the burning of the Ben Sherrod, on the Mississippi, in the same year.

The British committee declare themselves unable to make any satisfactory estimate of the loss of property by steamboat disasters. Mr. Woodbury estimates the loss in the United States at five or six millions of dollars.

From a review of the above statements, we are confirmed in the belief that the number of disasters on board of steamboats on the American Atlantic coast, is not greater than in England, in proportion to the number of boats, and we doubt if it is so great. On the western waters the case is quite otherwise.—This may be in part accounted for by the peculiar dangers to which steamers are subject in those waters, from snags or sunken trees, which it appears have caused 52 of the disasters mentioned, or nearly a quarter of the whole number.

STATISTICS OF COTTON.

From the Mobile Journal.

The entire growth of cotton in the world is set down at 1,000,000,000 pounds. Of this, 550,000,000 are supposed to be grown in the United States—30 in Brazil—8 in the West Indies—27 in Egypt—36 in the west of Africa—190 in the west of Asia—35 in Mexico and S. America, except Brazil—and 14 millions elsewhere.

Thus, at ten cents per pound, (a price below which it has rarely ever fallen) this crop is worth $100,000,000. For the last 50 years, however, the value (though often fluctuating suddenly and widely) has averaged 19 1/3. At this price, the present growth of the world is worth $192,500,000.

Of this, about 350 millions of pounds are consumed and manufactured in England—about 150 millions in the United States—80 in France—250 in China and India—15 in South America and Mexico, including Brazil—35 in Germany—45 in Turkey and Africa—10 in Spain—25 in Prussia—and the remainder elsewhere.

The value of cotton manufactures in England, is believed to be annually about 170 millions of dollars—in France, 70 millions—in the United States, 60 millions.

The capital employed in manufacturing by machinery is estimated, in England, at 200 millions of dollars—in France, at 120 millions—in the United States, at 110 millions.

The consumption in manufactures of raw cotton in all Europe in 1803, was estimated at only 60 millions of pounds. [Dic. of Span. Com.] The whole consumption in Europe, in 1830, was about 287 millions of pounds. In 1838, it is believed to be nearly 500 millions of pounds.

South Carolina and Georgia were the first states in this union to grow cotton to any considerable extent, 1791, two millions of pounds were grown in the union—1 1/2 millions of which grew in South Carolina, and one half million in Georgia.

In 1801, 40 millions was the crop of the United States—of which 20 millions grew in South Carolina, 10 in Georgia, 5 in Virginia, 4 in North Carolina, and 1 in Tennessee.

In 1811, the crop of the United States had reached 80,000,000—of which 40 grew in South Carolina, 20 in Georgia, 8 in Virginia, 7 in North Carolina, 3 in Tennessee and 2 in Louisiana.

In 1821, one hundred and seventy millions of pounds were growing in the union, as follows: 50

*This number, however, includes about 40 who perished in the Thames, in consequence of accidents occasioned by steamers.

millions in South Carolina, 45 in Georgia, 20 in Tennessee, 20 in Alabama, 12 in Virginia, 10 in North Carolina, 10 in Louisiana and 10 in Mississippi.

In 1826, the whole crop of the union was $45 1/2 millions. Of this, Georgia grew 75 millions, South Carolina 70, Tennessee 45, Alabama 45, Louisiana 38, Mississippi 20, Virginia 25, North Carolina 15, Florida 2 and Arkansas one half of a million.

In 1833, the crops of the United States had increased to 437 3/4 millions. Of this, 88 millions grew in Georgia, 73 in South Carolina, 70 in Mississippi, 65 in Alabama, 55 in Louisiana, 50 in Tennessee, 15 in Florida, 13 in Virginia, 10 in North Carolina and 3 1/4 in Arkansas.

The next year, 1834, the crops had increased to 457 1/2 million and was grown as follows.—85 in Mississippi, 55 in Alabama, 75 in Georgia, 65 1/2 in South Carolina, 62 in Louisiana, 43 in Tennessee, 20 in Florida, 10 in Virginia, 9 1/2 in North Carolina and 1 1/2 in Arkansas. Subsequently, no certain data are in our possession; but the estimate at this time is 550 millions as the whole crop of the union.

Thus it will be seen, that from 1791 to 1826, South Carolina was the most abundant cotton growing state in the union. In 1826 Georgia took the lead, and held it till 1854, when Alabama and Mississippi took the front rank. At this time, Mississippi is perhaps the most extensive cotton growing state in the union.—South Carolina and Alabama are next. North Carolina is beginning to deteriorate as a cotton country; while the worn lands in middle Tennessee are thought to improve for this culture—maturity, the vital desideratum, not being so easily allowed in the rank luxuriance of the fresher soils. COTTON PLANT.

A late Paris journal gives a tabular statement of the importations and sales of cotton at Havre, for the last fifteen years. We subjoin a statement from 1835 inclusive, made up to the first of June in each year.

On hand	Arrivals	Sales in	On hand
1st Jan.	5 mos.	5 mos.	1st June.
1835, 22,000	137,171	67,571	103,400
1836, 18,800	172,507	125,907	79,800
1837, 45,500	134,959	103,959	91,500
1838, 33,000	143,220	130,340	36,800
1839, 39,800	134,235	111,235	50,000

Our commercial friends will perceive that, compared with the previous years, there has been no excess of shipments to France, the present large stock being caused by the great deficiency of sales which are less than in any year with one exception (1831) since 1825.

BROAD CLOTH SMUGGLING.

The trial which has been going on at Boston, arising out of a seizure of British broad cloths, smuggled through the custom house by one Bottomly, a British agent, has resulted in a verdict in favor of the United States. His case is said by the New York Express to be similar to that of Samuel R. Wood, in New York a few months since, except that in this case the fraud was committed by collusion with a custom house officer. These cases of fraud have occurred very frequently of late, and unless something is done effectually to stop it, knives will acquire a monopoly of the market, and drive honest importers out of the business. We copy from the Boston Gazette the following excellent remarks on the subject:

Bottomly, the person implicated in the case now before court, is an Englishman, having accomplices in his own country, and in our own custom houses. With such associates our laws are set at defiance, and the revenue defrauded. By such miscreants, immense quantities of British goods are thrown into the market, by paying very low duties or none at all, to the prejudice of the regular importer, and the destruction of the manufacturing interests. It is owing to these infamous proceedings, that our woollen manufactures have languished, and many of those engaged in them ruined.

With such extensive frontiers as we have, and such facilities to corrupt the officers of the government, owing to the leniency of our laws, it is difficult to find a remedy for this glaring evil. Nevertheless, it is incumbent on business men, to devise some means to prevent the practice of smuggling in every shape. How shall this be accomplished? A single mode occurs,—that of having severe penal laws. The existing statutes merely provide for the confiscation of the goods detected, as smuggled. But the profit of the smuggling is so enormous, and the difficulty of detection so great, that these foreign swindlers are willing to run the risk of seizure. They deliberately make calculations, based on the chances of detection. If now and then a lot of goods is seized, they are willing to abandon them to confiscation, and rely on successful future efforts, to make up the loss. Thus is the practice interminable.

Our laws are therefore deficient of rigor. In addition to the confiscation of the goods, the law ought to declare, the smuggling or making false invoices, felony, punishable in the territory. This would give character to the laws, and aim at the character of the offenders. Men, who would be willing to expose their property to the chances of forfeiture, for the chances of gain would hesitate to expose their carcasses to incarceration and hard labor.

A memorial to congress on this subject would probably be listened to, and we doubt not, that it would be signed by every honest business man of our city, and of every other city in the union. It is a matter on which people of all parties would concur,—whether tariff men or anti-tariff,—whether free traders or manufacturers. Every body would be for a fair competition. A petition to congress in favor of such a penal law, if followed by enactment, would have a happy effect on the whole community.

The general features of the above case, are contained in the following extract of a letter to the editor of the United States Gazette, from its New York correspondent:

"The case of fraud on the revenue, which has been before the U. S. district court at Boston, for the last week, was brought to close on Friday last, when a verdict in favor of the United States was returned. The general features of the case are as follows:—

"James Bottomly, jr. a large importer of wollens, was very intimate with James Campbell, a deputy collector; he never entered any importations without the assistance of this deputy, and the package sent to the appraiser's as a sample of each invoice, was always of a particular kind, viz: the package of the highest cost in the invoice.

"The officers suspected some design, and seized an invoice of fifteen packages of wollens. The package was sent to the appraiser and found to be exactly invoiced, and the residue one-third at least below real value. On referring to the books of the custom house, it was found that Mr. Bottomly had made at least twenty-one entries, by the assistance of deputy Campbell, in every case by the highest cost package of each invoice.

"The goods at issue are supposed to have been part of those twenty-one false and fraudulent entries. The proper marks, tags and numbers were missing, and the ends of the pieces, and the boxes in which they were placed, were singularly gouged and cut, apparently with the view to erase the means of tracing the goods.

"Judge Davis decided that the government had made out a case of "probable cause" of fraud, and this placed the burden of proof upon the claimant to trace the goods to their origin, and show that they were regularly imported, and that the allegations in the information were false. Having failed to do this, the goods are of course legally forfeited. Their value is about $10,000."

DEPARTURE OF THE STEAM SHIPS.

We copy the following graphic accounts of the departure of the steam ships from the New York papers of the 21st inst. The scene, indeed, was a glorious one, and the exultation manifested by the people a noble tribute to those who have accomplished the great triumph over the winds and waves.

From the New York Express.

At 1 o'clock, yesterday, the Great Western left her pier,—and nearly 2 o'clock, the British Queen followed after. The Great Western was off Staten Island on the quarantine ground before the British Queen got out of the East River. These ships have had superb berths in two new piers built for them at the tobacco inspection warehouse, where they have been agreeably located both for the reception of passengers and of cargo. We understand that the three companies, of London, Bristol and Liverpool, have made a contract to have berths for a term of years,—and that after May next, a steam ship will leave them for England regularly every ten days. They are now the only piers in the city, which can accommodate these Leviathan visitors.

Prodigious masses of people crowded the Battery, and the wharves and vessels on the East River, to see these ships go off. The number was legion,—and the roofs of the houses were pretty well filled, not only in New York, but in Brooklyn and Jersey City. It is stated by those who had a whole view of this display of the multitude from the roofs of houses in favorable situations, that there has been nothing like it in New York for a long time. The ladies of that part of the city which overlooks the East River, and the ladies of Williamsburgh, Brooklyn, &c. seemed to have deserted their parlours and saloons for the roofs of their houses. Brooklyn heights were lined with people. The steamboats in the harbor made a most magnificent show as an escort on the occasion. How many of these boats there were, it is difficult to say, for at times, the East River seemed to be full of them,—but conspicuous among the number was the Neptune, which, it is said, had eleven hundred persons on board at the time.—Streaming with flags, as they were ad alive with persons, the whole scene presented a picture of uncommon beauty.

Any thing like an estimate of the number of persons who were viewing this departure of the steam ships would be but the merest conjecture, but we are told that the crowd that thronged the piers, where the ships were, was immense,—and we very much doubt whether any event in the city of late years, has attracted at once such a multitude of gazers. The curiosity even of the softer sex got the better of their timidity, that they, with their children pretty well filled the piers, and the surrounding wharves where the ships were. Business of the time quite suspended, so much were the population absorbed, that at times parts of the city seemed to be quite deserted.

The rapidity with which the British Queen was got off, is amazing,—for she has had but three working days, and a small part of Thursday, but the work upon her has been unremitting. Her paddles have been widened. Ballast and coal have sunk her deeper in the water. The most extraordinary efforts have been made to put her punctually upon the line as advertised, and her consignees, her agents and her officers have been remarkably successful. The spectacle often presented about her, has been amusing and novel—and of it, there has been no remission night nor day. Coal and beef, ice and specie, baggage and mutton, have been promiscuously huddled on board, with great rapidity,—and if one thing can be untangled after another, the workmen must have been wonderful in the preservation of order. It is no easy job to send off an Astor house 3,000 miles on the sea, in three days.

We have not heard of any serious accidents, notwithstanding the crowded state of the harbor. The steamboat Novelty broke her shaft, and was towed up to town by the steamboats Liberty and Wave.

The Great Western passed out of the East river at half past 1, P. M. attended by the steamers Arrow and Passaic, both filled to overflowing with passengers. The British Queen left the river at 2, P. M. attended by the steamer Neptune, also crammed with passengers. The pilot boat Essex, capt. Heyer, saluted both steamers in handsome style as they passed the Essex, which was returned by the steamers.

The Great Western passed Sandy Hook light, all sails set, quarter to 3 o'clock. The Queen passed 5 minutes to 4 o'clock. They have now passed beyond the escape of jurisdiction, but the most important item to be noted from the other side, for those who have wagers, will be,—which arrived out first.

From the Courier and Inquirer.

About the hour, yesterday, at which it was announced that the British steam ships would leave their moorings at the wharf, on their return voyage, our streets, usually so thronged with people, were comparatively deserted, and the shores on either side of the river were literally swarming with the multitude. On the New York side, the vessels at the wharves were crowded from their decks to their masts, every spot from which a sight of the river could be caught, even the house tops, was filled, and the battery in particular,—the great resort on such occasions—seemed teeming with human beings. Nor was the Brooklyn shore less a place of resort. From the navy yard to Red Hook, the heights were lined with spectators, all anxious, if not to say the least, curiosity, at least to be able to say that they had seen the steam ships depart. Perhaps an expectation that there would be something like a trial of speed between the two competitors for the honors of Atlantic navigation, added to the general curiosity exhibited. If it were so, disappointment, in this respect, could not be more complete, for we are happy to say that the commanders of each vessel, and all concerned in them, repudiate the idea of obtaining any advantage in public estimation by the dangerous expedient of calling to their aid more than the usual quantum of that mighty power which impels them.

On regarding the scene which the East river and its shores yesterday presented, the thought that would probably first suggest itself to a reflecting mind would be: how insignificant are the objects which have called this mass together,—though these objects are the work of human intelligence in one of its highest efforts,—compared with the imposing spectacle of such a concentration of human beings, of the great city they have reared for themselves, of nature's hand seen in the broad expanse of waters which courses along its shores! Even when the steam ships themselves entered on the scene, we involuntarily called to mind a passage in one of Walter Scott's novels where he speaks of the comparative pigmy display which a large military array made amid the high bills of Scotland.

But a truce to philosophizing. Our task is to tell of the departure of the steam ships. At about twenty minutes past one, the frigate of a gun from the Great Western announced her departure from the wharf, and she proceeded, occasionally firing as she went, along the usual channel to sea. The British Queen left her moorings at ten minutes past two, made a slight curve up to the navy yard, and then stood on her course. As she passed the U. S. ship North Carolina, the band paid her the same compliment they had on her arrival, of playing "God save the queen." She, too, occasionally saluted the city, which was answered from the guns at Castle Garden. At the Narrows she was detained half an hour in putting on board the steam packet Neptune a boat load of the friends of the passengers, and then pursued her way. When last seen, at about 18 miles distant from the city, the Great Western was about fifteen miles ahead of the Queen, the latter then going along majestically, with some sail set.

The steamers Neptune, Passaic, Novelty, Hercules and Arrow accompanied the British steamers to sea. They were crowded with passengers, bedecked with flags and provided with bands of music.

The mayor of Puttsmouth, Eng. previous to the departure of the British Queen steamer on her voyage to New York, invited, in the name of the bourgeois and inhabitants of the place, captain Roberts, her commander, his officers and crew, and all the passengers she might bring from New York on her return, to an entertainment on a large scale. Fat times for the passengers.

PERILOUS ADVENTURE AT THE FALLS OF NIAGARA.

Buffalo, July 26.

An occurrence of most thrilling interest took place at Niagara Falls yesterday afternoon, attended with immense peril to the lives of two individuals, but resulting in a most happy and providential deliverance.

The new bridge to Iris island is planted in a frightful rapid, where the current is from 20 to 30 miles an hour, and is only about 100 or 150 yards above the brow of the great precipice or perpendicular fall. A carpenter by the name of Chapin was engaged with others in covering the bridge, and while at work upon a staging about 100 feet from Iris island, accidentally lost his footing and was precipitated into the rapids, and in the twinkling of an eye swept away towards the great cataract. Speedy and inevitable destruction seemed to await him; but fortunately he was uninjured by the fall, and even in this most hopeless condition retained perfect self-possession. Turning his eye toward the only point of hope above the fearful precipice, he succeeded, by great dexterity in swimming, in effecting a landing upon a little island some twenty feet in width and length, the outermost of the group of Little Cedar islands, situated some thirty or forty yards above the falls, and about equidistant from Goat Island and the American shore.

There he stood for an hour, looking calmly and beseechingly back upon the numerous spectators who lined the bridge and shores, but with whom he could hold no conversation on account of the distance, and the roar of the rapids.

There is a man in the village of the Falls by the name of Robinson, of extraordinary muscular power, great intrepidity, and withal an admirable boatman—and he was probably the only one that could have been found in this city, who so generously volunteered his services to attempt reaching the island in a boat and bring Chapin off. A light boat of two oars, similar in construction to the White Hall race boats, was soon procured, and he embarked.

He proceeded with great deliberation and consummate skill, darting his little boat across the rapid channels, and at the intervening eddies holding up, to survey his situation and recruit his strength for the next trial. In a few minutes he neared the island, but a rapid channel still intervened, sweeping close to the island, and rendering the attempt to land very difficult. He paused for a moment, and then, with all his strength, darted across and sprang from his boat—his foot slipped, and he fell backward into the rapid current. With the spectators it was a moment of thrilling interest and breathless silence; his boat seemed inevitably lost, and himself in fearful jeopardy. Retaining, however, his grasp on the boat, he sprang in, and again seizing his oars brought up under the lee of the little island. All again felt a momentary relief, but still the great labor and hazard of the enterprise remained to be overcome. A cool head and a strong arm could only effect it—Robinson proved equal to the task. Taking his companion on board in the same careful and deliberate manner, though at infinitely greater hazard and labor, they effected a safe landing on Goat island.

There the spectators assembled to give them a cordial greeting. A scene of great excitement ensued. The boat was drawn up the bank, and it was moved and carried by acclamation that a collection be taken up on the spot for Chapin and his noble-hearted deliverer, Robinson. It was a generous one, and was thankfully received; but the rejection to Robinson that he has renewed a fellow-being under such circumstances will be to his generous heart a much richer one. After the collection, Robinson and Chapin took their seats in the boat, and were carried in triumph on the shoulders of their neighbors to the village.

The intense interest of the whole scene was heightened by the presence of Chapin's wife and children, who stood on the shore, watching with unavailing horror and agony what seemed his inevitable and painful fate. With what devout and heartfelt gratitude must they have thanked God when the husband and parent once more stood by their side safe and sound. [Com. Advertiser.

SURVEY OF THE COAST OF THE U. S. AND THE PREPARATIONS OF STANDARD WEIGHTS AND MEASURES FOR THE CUSTOM HOUSES AND THE RESPECTIVE STATES OF THE UNION.

From the Washington Globe.

Believing that a brief sketch of the object and progress made in these two great national works may prove interesting to our readers and the community generally, we have taken some pains to procure accurate information from authentic sources on these subjects. The following contains the result of our inquiries:

SURVEY OF THE COAST.

The attention of congress was first invited to the subject of a survey of the entire coast of the United States by president Jefferson in 1807, and a law was accordingly passed in that year, authorising and requesting the president "to cause a survey to be taken of the coasts of the United States, in which shall be designated the islands and shoals, with the roads or places of anchorage, within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States; and also the respective courses and distances between the principal capes or head lands, together with such other matter as he may deem proper for completing an accurate chart of every part of the coasts within the extent aforesaid."

The act further authorised and requested the president, "for any of the purposes aforesaid, to cause proper and intelligent persons to be employed, and also such of the public vessels in actual service as he may judge expedient, and to give such instructions for regulating their conduct as to him may appear proper according to the tenor of this act."

The duty of carrying into effect this law was devolved by the president on the secretary of the treasury, Mr. Gallatin. Accordingly, in March, 1807, a circular was issued by that officer, requesting the suggestion of the outlines of a plan of the contemplated work, "to unite correctness and practicability." Various plans were presented, and one submitted by professor F. R. Hassler was adopted by the president; but, owing to the situation of the external relations of the country at that period, the president deemed it best to postpone commencing the work, and, in the mean time, directed Mr. H. to furnish descriptions of the scientific instruments required for the prosecution of the work. These preliminaries being settled, and it appearing that the necessary instruments could not be procured in the country, it became necessary to send to Europe for them, whither Mr. Hassler was instructed to proceed for that object. He accordingly embarked for England in the year 1811, and had the necessary instruments prepared under his immediate direction and inspection. Before this commission was accomplished, however, the peace of the country was interrupted, and Mr. Hassler was thus prevented from returning to the United States with the instruments until towards the close of the year 1815.

In the year 1818 Mr. Dallas, then secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president, engaged the services of Mr. Hassler, who entered on the undertaking as superintendent of the entire work, with authority to employ officers from the corps of engineers and from the navy as assistants, and to provide the necessary equipments, &c. for the successful prosecution of the work. After the preparatory reconnoitering and surveys, a base line was established and duly ratified by careful calculation in New Jersey in 1817, and sundry primary triangulations projected and completed during said year. The work at this period was interrupted by the omission of congress to make the necessary appropriations, presumed to have been owing to the urgent demand for funds to meet the payments on account of the heavy national debt then due by the country, and other important objects of a public nature. Matters thus remained until the passage of the act of the 10th July, 1832, entitled "an act to carry into effect the act to provide for a survey of the coast of the United States," by which the act of 1807 was revived, and requiring the survey to embrace the coasts of Florida. This act also authorizes the president, "in the execution of the law, to employ all persons in the land and naval service of the United States, and such astronomers and other persons as he may deem proper."

Mr. Hassler was again appointed by the president to make the survey under the superintendence of the treasury department, on the same terms agreed upon in 1816. Under the fostering care of congress, this great national work has been since prosecuted with as much vigor and activity as the nature of it would admit of, and many highly important results have already been realized, and amongst them the discovery of another channel to the harbor of New York, of sufficient depth of water for the safe passage of vessels of the largest class in and out of that port.

The superintendent has under his direction several able assistants and officers under them, engaged in the topographical part of the survey, and are divided into separate corps for accomplishing the main and secondary triangulations, and the planetable operations. Besides, there are four vessels employed in the hydrographical portions of the work, in making the necessary soundings and examination of currents, shores, bays, harbors, &c. on the coast. These operations are conducted by intelligent and experienced naval officers, (under the immediate direction of the superintendent) where determinations are grounded on points and results first established by the topographical parties on the land, and thereby giving to them mathematical precision and certainty.

A recent casual examination of the report of the superintendent, made to the secretary of the treasury, and laid before congress at the last session, it appears that the work has been completed in all its details throughout that part of the coast and adjacent waters lying between the eastern extremity of Long Island Sound, to the neighborhood of Long Branch, New Jersey, and the necessary triangulations to pursue the survey and soundings of the Delaware, the outer sea shore and Barnegat bay, have been extended southerly to the vicinity of Cape May, and towards the north to Mount Carmel, in Connecticut. Sounding parties are now engaged in completing their operations between the points indicated. Accurate maps and charts of the respective portions of the work, as it progressed, have been prepared, and whenever directed by congress to be published, will, no doubt, furnish highly important information, and prove of great practical public utility, and especially to the maritime portion of the community.

STANDARD WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

In December, 1819, on the motion of Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina, a resolution was adopted by the house of representatives, directing the secretary of state "to report to this house what information he may be able to obtain as to the regulations and standard for weights and measures in the several states, and as to the proceedings in foreign countries for establishing uniformity in weights and measures; together with such a plan for fixing a standard of weights and measures for the United States, as he may deem most proper for their adoption."

In compliance with this resolution, a very able and interesting report was made by the secretary of state, (Mr. Adams), in February, 1821, detailing many important facts, and exhibiting a remarkable difference between the weights and measures used at the respective custom houses.

No further proceedings appear to have taken place in the matter until May 1830, when a resolution was adopted in the senate of the United States, on the motion of Mr. Woodbury, then senator from New Hampshire, directing the secretary of the treasury "to cause a comparison to be made of the standards of weights and measures now used in the principal custom houses in the United States, and report to the Senate at the next session of congress."

In obedience to this resolution, the required comparison was commenced under the immediate superintendence of Mr. F. R. Hassler, whose high reputation for scientific acquirements generally, and experience in this branch especially, recommended him as peculiarly qualified for the undertaking. It was conducted on the best established scientific principles, and the result exhibited such remarkable disparity in the weights and measures used in the different custom houses, as to demonstrate the urgent necessity of providing standards for their regulation, to insure uniformity throughout the United States. Reports were accordingly made by the secretary of the treasury to the senate in 1831 and '32, accompanied by a detailed statement prepared by Mr. Hassler, showing the mode of conducting the comparison and the results obtained. In some cases the bushel was found to differ quite six quarts, and the twenty-eight pound weight to differ between two and three ounces. The yard stick differed less, though it was usually too long. As the general collection act of 1793 requires a periodical "examination and trial of the weights and measures, and other instruments used in ascertaining the duties on imports, to be made with standards to be provided by each collector at the public expense," the treasury department forthwith gave directions to have the necessary standards prepared according to authentic units ascertained and recommended by Mr. Hassler.

"The avoirdupois pound (which is the pound of commerce) to be derived from the troy pound of the mint by the legal proportions of 5,760 grains, which constitute the troy pound, to 7,000 grains troy, which constitute the avoirdupois pound. The liquid measure to be the wine gallon of 231 cubic inches; and the dry measure the Winchester bushel of 2,150.42 cubic inches, according to the standard of 36 inches, adopted as the English yard."

Brass being decided to be the most suitable material for the standards, and it being important to have it of the best quality, it was accordingly prepared from American zinc ore and the purest copper to be obtained. The result has been the production of brass of a very superior quality, prepared in this city by the superintendent and his assistant.

The standard weights have already been completed and delivered to the respective custom houses, and the measures of capacity and of length have been mostly fabricated, and are now undergoing proper comparison and final adjustment, which it is expected will be completed in an early period. Some judgment can be formed of the difficulty in making this adjustment, when it is stated that the scales to test the weights can be turned by a hair, and that the thinnest silk paper can be detected on the end of the yard.

By a joint resolution of congress, approved the 14th of June, 1836, the secretary of the treasury is directed "to cause a complete set of all the weights and measures adopted as standard, and now either made or in the progress of manufacture for the use of the several custom houses, and for other purposes, to be delivered to the governor of each state in the union, or such persons as he may appoint, for the use of the states respectively, to the end that an uniform standard of weights and measures may be established throughout the union."

We understand that the standard weights have already been completed for the respective states, and the executives thereof duly advised of the fact. In many instances, they have been delivered, and in others the department is awaiting the receipt of proper directions as to their delivery and transmission.

The preparation of the weights and measures, as well as their distribution, has at all times been under the general superintendence of the head of the treasury department; but that of the survey of the coast was, in 1832, transferred from the treasury to the navy department, then in charge of Mr. Woodbury, as secretary. In 1835, after that gentleman was placed at the head of the treasury department, the survey of the coast was again put in charge of the latter department, where it still remains.

We cannot conclude this hasty sketch, without again adverting to the great importance of these works in a national point of view, and according our humble meed of praise to those distinguished men who conceived, as well as those who counted and supported the undertakings. By the first mentioned work, all the wrongs, points in our extensive seacoast, with the numerous bays, harbors, shoals, currents, &c. together with the true location and bearing of the respective light houses and beacons, will be established with scientific exactness and precision; and by the last, the no less important regulation of a system prescribing uniformity in regard to weights and measures throughout the union. These facts cannot fail to commend the works to the favorable consideration of the American people, as they will tend to exalt our national character, and be deemed lasting memorials of the age and of the institutions under which they were matured and accomplished.

OFFICIAL ACCOUNT OF THE PROGRESS OF THE PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

From the Globe of 31st July.

THE NEW TREASURY.

Since the adjournment of congress, many additional rooms in this building have been completed, and occupied by the different bureaus connected with the treasury department. Beside the secretary, who, with his suit, occupied rooms in this building the last year, we now have to add the treasurer, the register, the first comptroller, the attorney general, the solicitor and the commissioner of the general land office. The secretary, for the present, occupies the north wing on the first or colonnade floor; the attorney general the west side of the south wing, on the same floor; the solicitor the east side of the same wing, on the same floor; the treasurer occupies rooms adjoining both the attorney general and solicitor. The first comptroller's rooms are on the west side of the south wing, second floor; the register's rooms on the east side of the same wing, and second floor; the commissioner of the land office occupies the whole of the rooms in the north wing, upon the second and third floors.

The west wing is in rapid progress of construction, and will probably be in a state to be occupied the ensuing winter: the four floors in this wing will contain forty-eight rooms.

As this structure draws nigh completion, its adaptation to the object of its construction becomes more manifest. The fears which, in the incipient state of the work, were entertained by some on this and other grounds, have proved to be groundless. The corridors, both in their width and quantity of light, are amply sufficient. The rooms are abundantly large for the transaction of the public business. The attic, or third story rooms, which it was thought would be dark and uncomfortable, are airy, pleasant and sufficiently lighted. And lastly, upon the stability of the building, in its walls and arches, upon which a doubt was expressed by some, there can be now but one opinion, and that altogether in its favor. Nothing can be more beautiful than the vaulted ceilings of the rooms, halls and corridors; in their lightness and form of construction we have exhibited the triumphs of science and art over the gravity of mere matter.

The floors of the corridors in the two principal stories are paved with black and white marble tiles, disposed diamond fashion; the attic corridor floors are paved with the German white and red flag stone; and the cement corridor floor will be paved with the same flag stone.

The main corridor, running north and south, extends 340 feet; that running east and west 170 feet. These corridors, with their vaulted ceilings and tessellated pavements, produced a fine effect to the eye, engaging their whole extent. When the grand staircase (which is to be of white marble) shall have been completed, and thrown into contiguity with its spacious hall, studded with massive doric columns, which support a fretted groin ceiling, this central entrance to the building will be at once striking and picturesque. In front and on either hand extend the vaulted corridors, into which all the various offices open and communicate with each other on every floor.

The whole interior plan is so arranged as to afford every facility of intercourse between the different bureaus, with every admissible economy of space and security of the public records deposited there. The dressings of all the doors and windows, and also the skirting or base course of the rooms and corridors, are of stone, and the floors of the rooms covered with hydraulic cement, which is for this purpose equal to stone itself, and vastly more economical.

There are three main approaches upon the colonnade level to the interior of the building, which conduct to so many marble stairways leading up to the different stories, and down to the basement apartment. On the basement floor a number of rooms have been and are now nearly finished, and some occupied. As the cut stone for the west wing walls, now under construction, has to be carried through the corridor of this story, neither it nor the rooms can be completed for office business. When this operation ceases, the whole will be finished, and the accommodations furnished here will be little inferior to those on the third story. The floor of the basement rooms is a step above the ground, and being constructed of solid masonry, paved and cemented, with hydraulic mortar, they will be entirely dry.

The present extent of plan of this building, when the west wing is completed, will furnish about 150 rooms, of varied dimensions; the area of the office rooms exceeds 300 square feet, and their cubical contents 3,600 feet, ample space for two clerks, which were originally designated to accommodate.

The operations on this building have been chiefly confined this year to complete the interior for early occupancy. Nothing has been done towards rearing its magnificent colonnade. Many blocks of the columns are on the ground, and a few of them worked and set up on the terrace. A number of the capitals and bases are cut, which will forward this work when undertaken.

The grade of 15th street, in front of the colonnade terrace, is now undergoing a change, which, when carried out to completion, will obviate the natural defect complained of in the locality of the building, arising out of the rapid grade of the street, which covered up one end of the basement so deeply. The base of the colonnade will then present a level line in its whole extent, and thus the finished parts of the building be raised entirely out of the ground.

PROGRESS OF THE PATENT OFFICE BUILDING.

This edifice is now having its last or upper tier of arches turned. These arches, which form the ceiling of one immense room, are supported by twenty columns and twenty-eight pilasters, surmounted by their entablature, which decorate and divide it into eighteen alcoves. The whole extent of this grand saloon is 263 feet by 62 feet wide, and will be appropriated to the display of the models of art.

The exterior walls approach their finished height, and in some parts the main cornice is set. As the roof is now in preparation, and the arches are expected to be in a state to be covered in within a month or six weeks, there is every probability that the two suites of rooms below will be prepared for occupancy before the next meeting of congress.

The first or basement story of this building (which is above the ground) contains one large room for models, 70 by 62 feet; two other large rooms, 30 by 20 feet; eight rooms, 20 by 22 feet, besides a spacious hall and stair-case 86 by 38 feet, a corridor 15 feet wide, and four small rooms 20 by 10 feet.—These apartments are all vaulted with groin arches, and those in the hall and large model room sprung upon massive piers of stone.

The second or principal floor, which is level with the terrace of the portico, is similarly divided, and contains the same number of apartments of the same size as the story below, massive columns taking the place of the square pillars for supporting the arches. The upper or third floor has been already described.

The ascent to the principal floor will be by a flight of granite steps, which land on a spacious terrace spreading nearly 100 feet in extent, and 32 feet wide. This terrace is elevated on groin arches, and formed on the base of the building, which is composed of sixteen columns, in double rows, and two massive ante, rising with their entablature 50 feet, the whole surmounted by a portico. The proportions of this portico correspond with those of the Parthenon at Athens.

Passing across the terrace of the portico, you enter a spacious hall, decorated with columns which support groin arches, at the end of which a double flight of circular steps of marble will ascend to the grand model saloon. The whole of this story, together with the entire building, is vaulted, and made fire proof.

The operations on this edifice are all bent to rendering the interior habitable within the shortest period. Consequently, little or no progress has been made with the portico, except constructing its base, which is of massive granite, and turning the arch which is to support the steps.

The basement story of the building is constructed with cut stone (except on the base of the portico, which is dressed). The superstructure is built of freestone. The present building is in length 270 feet, and in depth 70 feet. When its wings are added, the facade will extend 240 feet.

This edifice has a commanding position, seated upon a ridge of ground which, from the top of the building, enabled the eye to range over the whole city. The principal approach to it is by 8th street, which is fronted by the portico, so that this imposing feature in the facade will or may be viewed all the way from Pennsylvania avenue. It is in contemplation to grade 8th street in such a manner as to enable the whole height of this portico, with its basement, to be seen from the avenue.

PROGRESS OF THE GENERAL POST OFFICE BUILDING.

The foundations of this edifice are in a rapid state of construction. Already the massive wall of the southern section are up to the level to receive the basement of granite, of which material three facades of this building are to be erected; the other walls are rising with despatch, and will, in the course of the next month, be ready for the cut stone work on every front. The centres for the first tier of arches will soon be set.

The marble work will commence early in the ensuing month. Extensive shops are now being erected on 7th street, in the "mill," for preparing the stone. The north front is to be erected of granite, which will proceed to be cut and set simultaneously with the marble, as will also the freestone, of which material the dressings of all the doors and windows in the interior of the building are to be formed.

A stronger or handsomer piece of work than that presented in the foundation walls of this building cannot be found any where. The stone is obtained from quarries on the Potomac, and is of a remarkably good quality for making substantial walls, being long and broad, and with square flat beds. The jamba and quoins in the interior have been formed of the old cut stone saved in the walls of the former building that was burnt; which, while adding to the beauty of the work, economizes in the cost of construction.

The plan of this building is a parallelogram, 204 feet in extent, and 65 feet in width, with two wings at right angles, 103 feet each, and 54 feet wide. The elevation will embrace three floors above the basement, and afford about eighty rooms for the business of the department. It is not intended to locate the city post office in this building, all the space being required for the accommodation of the department.

The style of architecture adopted in this edifice is the Corinthian; the order, composed of columns and pilasters, disposed upon a high rustic or channelled base, forming the first story. The marble to be used in its construction will be from the same quarries as have supplied the custom house in New York—a beautiful white stone. The granite will be obtained from the quarries on the Potomac—a handsome article, a specimen of which is presented in the blockings and steps in front of the treasury and patent office buildings. The freestone will come from Aquia creek, in Virginia.

The whole of this building will be constructed fire-proof, it being intended that every part should be vaulted, and the roof covered with copper. It is expected to be completed in two years.

PROGRESS OF THE NEW JAIL.

This building has progressed with every possible degree of rapidity since its commencement. The foundations were begun in May last; the walls are now raised one story, and the first tier of arches completed. The system of arching is intended to be continued above, so as to render the building entirely fire-proof.

The dimensions of this edifice are as follows: 100 feet front, 50 feet deep and 40 feet high, including three stories. By the interior arrangement, the criminal apartments are clearly separated from those of the debtors—the entrances being distinct to each. The walls of the cells and the arches are constructed with hydraulic cement, and every precaution adopted to guard against any attempt at an outbreak. The dormitories of the watchmen look into the passage leading to the criminals' cells. This passage divides the outer from the inner wall; so that the criminal would have to break through two walls before he could reach the yard or court of the prison. Each cell, as well as the entrances to the passages, will be closed with iron latticed doors.

The walls of the building are all of brick, which, externally, are to be stuccoed with cement to imitate stone work. The design of this edifice is in the simple Anglo Saxon style, with massive buttresses, capped with stone; between these buttresses runs an embattled parapet. A belfry will surmount the roof, to receive an alarm bell.

It is intended to provide accommodations in this building for the keeper and his assistants. The main or south front will not have the appearance of a prison, as the iron bars to the windows will be fixed inside. The edifice is located on the Judiciary square, upon a commanding site, a short distance north of the Court House square, and will include extensive grounds.

COURT HOUSE IN ALEXANDRIA, D. C.

This building was commenced the last spring, and is now nearly ready to receive the roof. Its dimensions are 60 feet square, and 40 feet high to the eaves. The roof is to be hipped all round, and its peak surmounted by a cupola or belfry. The principal front is ornamented with a doric portico of four columns, elevated upon a high basement, flanked by a double flight of stone steps, which ascend to the court-room floor.

The building, in its elevation, presents a basement, the principal and an attic story. On the first floor the offices of the court room are placed, the rooms of which are to be heated, and made fire-proof. These rooms all open into a spacious corridor, extending from front to rear. Beside the public steps on the outside, there is a stairway communicating with the upper floors.

The hall of the court, with its jury rooms, &c., are placed on the second floor, the public access to which is by the flight of stone steps before mentioned, ascending to the portico, from which you enter a vestibule, and pass from thence into the outer bar of the court room. This room is of ample dimensions, including the whole breadth of the building, sweeping more than a semicircle in its plan, and rising the height of the two stories. Across its diameter a spacious gallery stretches above, which is communicated with from a stairway in the vestibule. From the inner bar of the court room a door on each side leads into two small apartments under the gallery for the bailiffs, which are in advance of the two jury rooms in which they open. The grand jury rooms are above these, in the attic story, to which access is had by the same stairway that leads to the gallery.

In the sweep of the circle forming the hall of the court, two of the square angles of the building are cut off and enclosed, which furnish two small apartments for the judges and marshals, each having a window. The bar is divided to accommodate a number of desks, besides those for the judges, clerk, and marshal, and the jury boxes, &c. The area of the room includes near 3,500 square feet.

It is expected that the court will be able to occupy this building the coming spring term.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Early in the late session of congress, the president of the United States, in calling the attention of congress to the fact of the receipt and investment in state stocks of the bequest of James Smith, for the purpose of establishing in this city an institution under the above name "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men," transmitted to the two houses the following replies to letters addressed by the secretary of state to the writers, inviting the communications thus made. The subject being of very general interest, these letters independently of the names of the writers, will probably be generally acceptable to our readers.

[Nat. Id.

Quincy, October 8, 1838.

SIR: I duly received your letter, dated in July last, expressing the desire of the president of the United States to consult the views of persons versed in science and in matters relating to public education, as to the modes of applying the proceeds of the Smithsonian bequest, to meet the wishes of the testator, and which may prove most advantageous to mankind, with a view to present to congress the subject for their consideration and action upon it.

Having been the chairman of the committee of the house of representatives, and reporter of the bill which became the act of July 1, 1836, relating to this bequest, in which act the faith of the United States is pledged for the application of the funds, placed by the founder of this institution at their disposal, to the promotion of the great object of his munificence, the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, I have waited with anxious expectation the consummation of the first requisite for the accomplishment of the purpose—the recovery of the fund itself—aware that, until that should be effected, all speculation upon the most suitable appropriation of the proceeds would be premature. It is with the warmest satisfaction that I have learnt the successful attainment of this preliminary end.

When, at the last session of congress, provision was made by the sixth section of an act making appropriations for the West Point academy, for the temporary investment of the Smithsonian bequest, I regretted first that this provision was made, and secondly, that it was made in a separate bill, but as an appendage to one with which it had no proper connexion; secondly that the investment should be directed in stocks of states; and, thirdly, that it should give to the secretary of the treasury a discretionary power to invest the fund, at a yearly interest of five per cent. at the very time when the government itself of the U. States was issuing treasury notes at the rate of six per cent. Whatever may have been the occasion or the design of these arrangements, it was impossible to evade the remarks, that here was a deduction of one per cent. a year from the free gift of a noble-minded foreigner, for the most exalted purposes, to bestow it at the discretion of the secretary of the treasury, upon some favorite state. This did not appear to me to be an appropriation of the fund to the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, nor did it lead me to augur very well of the issue.

This, however, was but a temporary investment of the fund, which, I was willing to hope, would under no consideration be made permanent. In the report of the committee to the house of representatives, accompanying the bill which authorised the president to take the necessary measures for recovering the fund, I had set forth in very explicit language, my sense of the duties which developed on the government of the United States by their acceptance, in behalf of the nation, of this bequest; and with the same views, I introduced into the bill a pledge of the faith of the United States that the fund should be applied to the generous purpose of the testator.

Before leaving Washington last July, I took the liberty of calling upon the president, and of expressing to him my earnest hope that, in the interval before the next session of congress, he would be prepared with some plan for the permanent safe-keeping and security, unimpaired, of the fund itself, by investments which would yield a certain income as large as the ordinary interest of the country, and for appropriating that income to the object of the testator—the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men.

I was kindly received by the president, who assured me of his readiness to take into consideration any suggestions which I might be disposed to make on the subject, or those of any other person whom I might recommend.

Thus encouraged, I gave him freely the views which I entertained with regard to fixing the permanency of the fund, unimpaired, and to suitable objects of application for its annual income. The opinions which I gave were general, and, of course, not matured. Further reflection since that time has but slightly modified them, and I have not since had the opportunity of consulting with any person in my own judgment qualified to give counsel, or to act as a judicially perfectly disinterested, for the disposal of the fund.

The provision made at the last session of congress was made merely for an investment for a few months, that the fund should, after the arrival of the money in this country, not remain unoccupied, even until the next session of congress. The object now first deserving attention will be to secure the permanency of the fund entire; for which purpose, I must indulge the hope that it will not be intrusted to any bank, nor loaned upon any pledge of state stocks.

I should greatly prefer that it should be disposed of as was the fund of one hundred thousand dollars which had been held by the president of the United States in trust for an annuity of six thousand dollars, payable to the Seneca Indians. By the act of February 19, 1831, the whole fund was placed to the credit of the department of war, and the duty of making the annual payment to the Seneca tribe was assigned to the secretary. In the present case, the whole fund might pass to the credit of the treasury of the United States, and the annual payment be directed to be made by the secretary of the treasury. The fund, of course, to be redeemable at the discretion of congress, and otherwise invested for the objects of the institution.

This would give an annual appropriation of 30,000 dollars, and, to keep the fund permanently unimpaired, the annual appropriation should be confined to that sum.

I think that no part of the money should be applied to the endowment of any school, college, university or ecclesiastical establishment; to no institution for the education of youth, for that is a sacred obligation, binding upon the people of this union themselves, at their own expense and charge, and for which it would be unworthy of them to accept an eleemosynary donation from any foreigner whomsoever. Nor do I believe it to have been strictly within the intention of the testator. For the immediate object of the education of youth is not the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men, but the education of children in that which is already known. Its results is doubtless to diffuse, and may be to increase, knowledge among men; and so is apprenticeship to trades, and so is the tillage of the ground, and so was the ancient shepherds of Egypt and Challee, the nightly keeping of their flocks; for it enabled them, by the habitual observation of the stars, to trace their courses to some of the sublimest discoveries of astronomy.

Nor could the application of the fund to any ecclesiastical or religious establishment be a proper fulfillment of the testator's intention. The people of the United States have also religious duties to perform, for the charge and discharge of which they should not consent to be tributary, even in gratitude, to the bounty of any foreigner. The preaching of the gospel, like the education of youth, promotes the increase and diffusion of knowledge; but the worship of God, and the fulfilment of moral duties to man, the special duties of religious institutions, do not so much import the increase of knowledge as the right use of what is known.

I suggested to the president that annual courses of lectures on the principal sciences, physical and mathematical, moral, political and literary, to be delivered, not by permanent professors, but by persons annually appointed, with a liberal compensation for each course, were among the means well adapted to the end of increasing and diffusing knowledge among men.

But the great object of my solicitude would be to guard against the canker of almost all charitable foundations—jobbing for parasites, and sops for hungry incapacity. For the economical management of the fund, and the periodical application of it to appropriate expenditures, it should be invested in a board of trustees, to consist partly of members of both houses of congress, with the secretaries of the departments, the attorney general, the mayor of the city of Washington, and one of the inhabitants of the District of Columbia, to be incorporated as trustees of the Smithsonian fund, with a secretary and treasurer in one person, and to be the only salaried person of the board; to be appointed for four years, and be capable of reappointment, but removable for adequate cause by a majority of the board. Into details it is unnecessary to enter.

The first object of appropriation, however, in my judgment, should be the erection of an astronomical observatory for all the purposes of the Greenwich observatory, in England, and the bureau des longitudes, in France. This alone would absorb the annual income of the funds for seven years, and will form the subject of another letter. I am, with great respect, sir, your very obedient servant,
JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Quincy, October 11, 1839.

SIR: I have reserved for a separate letter what I proposed to say in recommending the erection and establishment of an astronomical observatory at Washington, as one and the first application of the annual income from the Smithsonian bequest, because of all that I have to say I deem it by far the most important, and because having for many years believed that the national character of our country demanded of us the establishment of such an institution, as a debt of honor to the cause of science and to the world of civilized man. I have hailed with cheering hope this opportunity of removing the greatest obstacle which has hitherto disappointed the earnest wishes that I have entertained of witnessing, before my own departure for another world, now ear at hand, the disappearance of a stain upon our good name, in the neglect to provide the means of increasing and diffusing knowledge among men, by a systematic and scientific continued series of observations on the phenomena of the numberless worlds suspended over our heads—the sublimest of the physical sciences, and in that in which the field of future discovery is as unbounded as the universe itself. I allude to the continued and necessary expense of such an establishment.

In my former letter I proposed that to preserve entire and unimpaired the Smithsonian fund, as the principal of a perpetual annuity, the annual appropriations from its proceeds should be strictly confined to its annual income. That, assuming the amount of the fund to be five hundred thousand dollars, it should be so invested as to secure a permanent yearly income of thirty thousand dollars; and that it should be committed to an incorporated board of trustees, with a secretary and treasurer, the only person of the board to receive a pecuniary compensation from the fund.

On the 18th of March, 1826, Mr. C. F. Mercey, chairman of a select committee of the house of representatives of the United States, reported to that house a bill for the erection of a national observatory at the city of Washington, together with sundry documents containing estimates of the cost of erecting the buildings necessary for such an establishment, for the instruments and books which would require, and for the compensation of a principal astronomer, two assistants, and two attendants. These estimates of expense were, however, prepared upon the principle of providing the establishment at the smallest possible expense—to which end it was proposed that it should be attached to the engineer's office, in the department of war, and that the mathematical and astronomical instruments already belonging to that department should be transferred to the use of the observatory. All this must of course be otherwise arranged, if the president and congress should approve the proposal of establishing the observatory on the Smithsonian endowment. But that document contains much valuable information, which may be made available whenever an observatory shall be erected. It is No. 124, house documents of the first session of the 19th congress.

In the estimate of expense at that time, by the chief engineer, he assigned for the necessary buildings only $14,500. But as it is desirable that the principal building, the observatory itself, should be, for the purpose of observation, unsurpassed by any other edifice constructed for the same purposes. I would devote one year's interest from the fund to the construction of the buildings; a second and third, to constitute a fund from the income of which the salaries of the astronomer, his assistants and his other necessary expenses, should be paid; a fourth and fifth, for the necessary instruments and books; a sixth and seventh, for a fund from the income of which the expense should be defrayed of publishing the ephemeris of observations, and a yearly nautical almanac. These appropriations may be so distributed as to apply a part of the appropriation of each year to each of those necessary expenditures; but for an establishment so complete as may do honor in all time alike to the testator and his trustees, the United States of America, I cannot reduce my estimate of the necessary expense below two hundred thousand dollars.

My principles for this disposal of the funds are these:

1st. That the most complete establishment of an astronomical observatory in the world should be founded by the United States of America; and the proper expense of which, both its first cost and its perpetual maintenance, should be amply provided for, without costing one dollar either to the people or to the principal sum of the Smithsonian bequest.

2d. That by providing from the income alone of the fund a supplementary fund, from the interest of which all the salaries shall be paid, and all the annual expenses of publication shall be defrayed, the fund itself would, instead of being impaired, accumulate with the lapse of years. I do most fervently wish that this principle might be made the fundamental law, now and hereafter, so far as may be practicable, of all the appropriations of the Smithsonian bequest.

3d. That, by the establishment of an observatory upon the largest and the most liberal scale, and providing for the publication of a yearly nautical almanac, knowledge will be disseminated among men, the reputation of our country will rise to honor and respect among the civilized nations of the earth, and our navigators and mariners on every ocean be no longer dependent on English or French observers or calculators for the tables indispensable to conduct their path upon the deep.

In the document to which I have above referred, there is a letter from M. de Wallenstein, then attached to the Russian legation in this country; a report from major Kearney of the topographical engineers; and extracts from a memoir of Mr. Francis Baily, respecting a new method of determining the longitude; all of which contain precious information, both of facts and encouragement for the application of a strenuous and persevering effort, on the part of the government of the United States, to contribute their effective aid, by this establishment, to the progress of physical and mathematical science. When the opportunity for this is afforded by the maintenance of a foreign astronomical observatory, the taxation of a dollar upon the people, I cannot forego the hope that this opportunity will not be lost, believing that, of all the physical sciences, there is none for the cultivation of which brighter rewards of future discovery are reserved for the ingenuity and industry of man than practical astronomy.

There is appended to the same congressional document a memorial to congress, from William Allen, president of Bowdoin college, and sundry other distinguished citizens of the state of Maine, praying for the establishment, at the charge of the nation, of an astronomical observatory in the town of Brunswick, in that state; and a memorial of Mr. Hassler, recommending two observatories—one in Maine and one in Louisiana. The memorial from Maine urges with great force and elegance some of the general considerations pointing to the usefulness and importance of an astronomical observatory in the western hemisphere. But it is doubtful, at least, whether any application of the Smithsonian bequest can, in fulfillment of the testator's will, be located otherwise than in the city of Washington; and if hereafter congress should ever be disposed to appropriate any portion of the national funds to these elevated purposes, observatories may be erected in Maine, or Louisiana, or both, which may be auxiliary to the labors of the Smithsonian institution at Washington, without in any manner interfering with its pursuits.

If the president should approve and give the weight of his recommendations to those suggestions I have no doubt they will receive the sanction of congress at their next session. As I propose the appropriation for seven successive years of all the income from the fund to this special object, there will be ample time for considering the best manner of appropriating the same income afterwards to permanent establishments for increasing and diffusing knowledge among men. Nothing could be more easy than to dispose of a fund ten times as large, without encroaching upon the proper sphere of any school, college, university or academy. Not so easy will it be to secure, as from a ratlesnake's fang, the fund and its income, forever, from being wasted and dilapidated in bounties to feed the hungry or fatten the leaden idleness of mountebank projectors, and shallow and worthless pretenders to science.

Since I have begun this letter, I have conferred with Mr. Bancroft, the collector of the customs at Boston concerning its object, who has promised to communicate his views on the subject to the president. I may, perhaps, after consultation with others, again address you in relation to it before my departure for Washington. I am, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

John Forsyth, esq. sec'y. of state U. S. Washington.

Providence, Oct. 2, 1839.

SIR: In reply to your communication, dated July last, requesting my views respecting the Smithsonian institute, I beg leave to state as follows:

1. It is, I suppose, to be taken for granted, that this institution is intended for the benefit not of any particular section of the United States, but for the benefit of the whole country; and also, that no expense, which may be necessary in order to accomplish its object, will be spared.

2. I think it also evident, that there is no need, in this country, of what may be properly termed collegiate education; that is, of that education which may be given between the ages of fourteen and sixteen, and eighteen or twenty. All the old states, and many of the new ones, have as many institutions of this kind as their circumstances require. And besides, since persons of the ages specified are too young to be, for a long period, absent from home, it is probably better that a large number of such institutions should be established within convenient distances of each other. The age of the pupils in these institutions would also render it desirable that very large numbers be not associated together.

3. It is probable that professional schools—that is, schools for divinity, law and medicine—will be established in every section of our country. Divinity must be left to the different Christian sects; law will probably be taught in the state, or at least the district, in which it is to be practised. The same will, I think, be true of medicine.

4. If the above views be correct, it will, I think, follow, that the proper place to be occupied by such an institution would be the space between the close of a collegiate education and a professional school. Its object would be to carry forward a classical and philosophical education beyond the point at which a college now leaves it, and to give instruction in a broad and philosophical principles of a professional education.

The demand for such instruction now exists very extensively. A very considerable portion of our best schools now graduate as early as their nineteenth, twentieth, or twenty-first year. If they are sufficiently wealthy, they prefer to wait a year before studying their profession. Some travel, some read, some remain as resident graduates, and many more teach school for a year or two, for the purpose of reviewing their studies. These would gladly resort to an institution in which their time might be profitably employed. The rapidly increasing wealth of our country will very greatly increase the number of such students.

The advantages which would result from such an institution are various. It would raise up and send abroad in the several professions a new grade of scholars, and thus greatly add to the intellectual power of the nation. But, specially, it would furnish teachers, professors and officers, of every grade, for all our other institutions. As the standard of education was thus raised in the colleges, students would enter the national university better prepared. This would require greater effort on the part of its professors, and thus both would reciprocally stimulate each other.

The branches which should be taught there, I suppose, should be the same as in our colleges, only far more generously taught—that is, taught to men, and not to boys—and the philosophical principles of law and medicine. This would embrace lectures on Latin, Greek, Hebrew, and the oriental languages; all the modern languages of any use to the scholar, with their literature; mathematics carried as far as any one would desire to pursue them; astronomy; engineering, civil and military; the art of war, beginning where it is left at West Point; chemistry; geology; mining; rhetoric and poetry; political economy; intellectual philosophy; physiology, vegetable and animal; anatomy, human and comparative; history; the laws of nations; and general principles of law, the constitution of the United States, &c.

5. Supposing such an institution to be established, something may be added respecting the mode of its constitution and organization.

I suppose then, that an institution of this kind is a sort of co-partnership between the instructors and the public. The public furnish means of education, as buildings, libraries, apparatus and a portion of the salary. The professors to do the labor, and provide for the remaining part of their income by their own exertions. Hence their arises naturally a division of the powers and duties of the parties. To the corporation, or governors, or trustees, or by what name they may be called, would belong the management of the fiscal concerns of the institution, and the control of that portion of its affairs which depended specially upon its relation with the public donation. The government of the institution, the conferring of degrees, the appointment of professors, would be performed jointly by the officers of instruction and the corporation.

In the English universities the government of the institution is vested in a general meeting of the former graduates. This forms a literary public, which exercises ultimate jurisdiction in most matters which require deliberation. How far such an institution might be constructed upon this principle, may be fairly a question.

6. If the above mentioned views should be adopted, it will be perceived that no funds will be required for dormitories. The young men will provide for themselves board and lodging wherever they please, and the professors will be responsible for nothing more than their education. It is supposed that they are old enough to govern themselves.

Hence the funds may be devoted to the following purposes:

1st. A part would be appropriated to the creation of a library, cabinets, and for the furnishing of all apparatus necessary to the instructors.

2d. A part to the erection of buildings for the above purposes, together with buildings for professors' houses.

3d. A fund would be established for the endowment of professorships, giving to each so much as may form a portion, say one-third or one-half, of his living, and the rest to be provided for by the sales of the tickets to his courses.

7. If the institution is governed by a board, this board should be appointed by the president and senate, or by the president alone, and they should hold their office for no longer a period than six years, one-third of them retiring, unless re-appointed, every two years.

8. Graduates of the university should be allowed to teach classes and receive payment for tickets, upon any of the subjects on which instruction is given in the regular course. This will prove a strong stimulant to the regular professors, and will train men up for teachers.

Degrees should never be conferred as a matter of course, but only after a strict and public examination. They should never be conferred either in course, or causa honoris, unless by the recommendation of the faculty.

I have thus very briefly, but as far as my avocations would allow, thrown together a few hints upon the subject to which you have directed my attention. That I should go into detail, I presume, was not expected. Whatever may be the plan adopted, I presume it will not be carried into effect until an extensive observation of the best universities in Europe has furnished the government with all knowledge which the present condition of the science of education can afford.

I have the honor to be, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
F. WAYLAND.

Hon. J. Forsyth, secretary of state.

Columbia, South Carolina, July 20, 1839.

SIR: With respect to the Smithsonian legacy, two courses only suggest themselves to my mind: one annual premiums for the best treatises on given subjects, which we have not literary or scientific men enough to supply or enter into any thing like competition with the Bridgewater treatises; and, therefore, we should only be disgraced by it. I therefore cannot recommend this mode of application. Add to which, it would be very apt to degenerate into a political and party institution, in various ways. The other is an institution of the character of an university. I am well aware the power of erecting an university was twice refused to congress, in the convention of 1787. But the objection may be gotten over by transferring the donation to the corporation of Georgetown, under such limitations as may be expedient and constitutional, and let an university be instituted by that corporation. This would be a sufficient approximation to Mr. Smithson's required locality, and would obviate the constitutional objection.

Such an university ought not to be opened, except to graduates of other colleges. The studies might be higher algebraical calculus; the application of mathematics to practical mechanical knowledge of every description, and to astronomy, to chemistry, electricity and galvanism; the principles of botany and agriculture. No Latin or Greek; no mere literature. Things, not words.

Strict attendance; strict and public examinations. I object to all belles-lettres and philosophical literature, as calculated only to make men pleasant talkers. I object to medicine, which cannot be well taught in a locality of less than 100,000 inhabitants.

I object to law; for all that can be orally delivered can be more profitably and deliberately learnt by perusal. Ethics and politics are as yet unsettled branches of knowledge.

Whether physiology and political economy ought to be rejected, requires more consideration than I can at this moment bestow. I want to see those studies cultivated, which, in their known tendencies and results, abridge human labor, and increase and multiply the comforts of existence to the great mass of mankind. Public education should be useful, not ornamental.

The course should not be less than 3 years, of 10 months each. The instruction afforded gratis; examinations for admission rigid. Such, in few words, are my notions on this subject, which I respectfully submit, sir, to your better judgment.

Accept, I pray you, the assurances of my sincere and high consideration.

THOMAS COOPER, M. D.

Sydenham, near Philadelphia, Nov. 6, 1838.

Sir: Referring to your letter of July, the receipt of which I had the honor to acknowledge, and desiring now to meet the wishes it conveys, however sincerely distrustful I am of myself in attempting the task, I proceed to remark, that a university or college, in the ordinary sense, or any other institution looking to primary education, or to the instruction of the young merely, do not strike me as the kind of institution contemplated by Mr. Smithson's will; declaring it, in language simple, yet of the widest import, to be "for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men;" and making the United States the trustee of his intentions, it seems to follow that it ought to be as comprehensive as possible in its objects and means, as it must necessarily be national in its government. In turning my thoughts to the subject, it is, therefore, only upon a basis the most comprehensive, under all views, that I can think of any general plan for its organization. Hence it appears to me—

1. That even officers of the United States, abroad and at home, might be made subservient to some of the main objects of the institution—as their consuls, naval and military officers; and, their foreign ministers.

Consuls, by their residence in foreign ports, have opportunities of becoming acquainted with the natural history and productions of the places where they reside, and other things to be known. This class of officers had instructions, at a former period of the government, to send home seeds, plants, and other productions beneficial to agriculture, manufactures, or any of the useful arts. But their efforts were frustrated or impeded for want of a fund to defray incidental expenses, which, however small, constitutional scruples existed against providing. The Smithsonian fund might supply the means of renewing such instructions, giving to them more scope as well as efficacy.

Our naval officers, those especially in separate commands on foreign stations, must have opportunities of gaining knowledge in other spheres than those to be filled by their usual reports to the navy department; and the same may be said of officers of the army, in regard to the war department. Many of the latter, by their stations at garrisons, or employment otherwise in remote and unexplored parts of our country, are in a peculiar manner situated, to collect facts bearing upon its geology, its natural history in all branches, its antiquities, and the character of its aboriginal races; the communication of which might advantageously fall in with the purposes of this institution, and be ultimately promulgated through its instrumentality.

I propose to include, also, ministers plenipotentiary among the functionaries who might serve the institution, and, through it, the general public, on this occasion. By their power of commanding the best intercourse in the several communities to which they are sent, they may open to themselves avenues to knowledge of all kinds; the transmission of which to the institution, under executive instructions to that effect, might often prove of high value. It would not be expected from them but at convenient intervals, and never when interfering with their primary duties. When an appropriate channel was opened for receiving communications of this nature, they would become, it may be presumed, an agreeable appendage to the primary duties of our ministers, affording a resource for their leisure, with opportunities of a more enlarged usefulness to their country and fame to themselves. Permanent missions were once objected to by Mr. Jefferson, as not within the true theory of our foreign intercourse, which seems to countenance the more a proposal for connecting with them the honorable appendage suggested, since neither official dignity nor usefulness can ever be impaired, though both may be heightened, by co-association with knowledge in other fields.

2. A building to be erected at Washington, with accommodations for the business of the institution. Ground to be attached to it, sufficient for re-producing seeds and plants, with a view to diffusing through the country such as might be found to deserve it. The officers of the institution to be a director, a secretary, a librarian and a treasurer. Persons to be under them to take care of the building and grounds. The officers to be appointed by the president and senate. The director to make an annual report to congress on the state of the institution, and oftener if necessary. Its affairs to be subject to the visitation of the president, aided by a standing board, to consist of the chief officers of the government, say, taking the example of a law already in the statute book in relation to the finances, the vice-president, the chief justice, the secretaries of state and the treasury, and the attorney general. The institution to have its press, as the university of Oxford, or otherwise authority to employ one for printing communications sent to it, and the lectures to be presently mentioned. Nothing to be printed but under the sanction of the director and standing board of visitors. To this and other ends, for the good government of the institution, the standing board to have the right to call in the assistance of three or more scientific or literary persons unconnected with it. The profits arising from all publications to go in aid of the needs of the institution. Communications from learned societies, or from individuals eminent in science or letters, in whatever part of the world, to be received by the director, and taken charge of by the secretary. The director to be authorized to correspond with any such societies or persons. A council to assemble once a month, to consist of the officers of the institution and the lecturers attached to it, before which all communications to be laid. Order to be then taken upon them. Such as go upon the archives, with a view to the question of publication, to be brought under the consideration of the standing board of visitors at the proper time, when that question will be decided. The director to preside at these councils, at the meetings of the standing board of visitors, and at all other meetings required by the business of the institution; and the secretary to keep the minutes. The standing board of visitors to hold stated meetings twice a year, and assemble on other occasions when they deem it necessary. At the commencement of the institution, the duties of librarian and treasurer to be united in the same person.

3. Lectureships to be established, comprehending as many of the leading branches of physical and moral science as the funds of the institution may be able to bear. Apparatus to be provided for the branches requiring it. One of the lectureships to be dedicated to government and public law. When conflicting opinions on government are raging in the world, to have the democratic principle, as modified by our systems of representation, and the conjoint workings of the federative and national principle, illustrated in elementary disquisitions, apart from temporary topics and passions, is a desideratum which the Smithsonian institution might supply. Such productions seem due to mankind, as to ourselves, imperfectly described as our institutions have been, through adverse feelings in the minds of our countrymen, as well as in the case of the Roman liberty fared in the hands of the royal historians. Rarely can foreigners, however enlightened, be equal to the task of justly analyzing the complicated movements, unintelligible to hasty observers, yet full of harmony, that maintain the order, prosperity and freedom of this great confederated republic, under guards combining the efficacy of popular sovereignty with its safety. Authentic explanations of them, all issuing from this institution, at an age when steam is quickening all intercourse throughout the world, would give new motives for listening to the doctrines and results of the democratic principle in this h-mis-phere. So expounded, it would go before the world without disparagement, and be fairly judged by its results. Under public law, the tenets of America, now locked up in diplomacy, or otherwise hidden or overlooked in Europe, might come into useful publicity; her proposals to Europe, to abolish privateering, and prohibit public ships from capturing merchant vessels upon the ocean, thus forever stripping war of more than half its evils upon that element—a stride in civilization to transcend, whenever it may be made, the West India abolition act; her resistance, single-handed, against the enforcement of British municipal law upon the ocean, as seen in the individual miseries and national violations involved in the feudal claim of impressment; and her desire, shown in other ways, for freeing the international code from barbarous relics, whereby this institution, working in its orbit of calm discussion, might become the ally of America towards gaining for these great public benefactions and others, the growth of our institutions, in our days, (so maligned for retaining the domestic servitude bequeathed to them by our progenitors), favor and acceptance among nations.

The steady abhorrence expressed by this government against employing savages in warfare between civilized and Christian states, and the numerous negotiations to prevent it, would further illustrate the harmonizing policy of America. Such are samples of the maxims that might claim elucidation from an institution reared under the sanction of this republic, and thence, by the principle of its existence, desirous of doing justice to them, examined in juxtaposition with those taught in the ancient and cloistered seminaries of the old world, and upheld by its governments.

The other lectureships, as the foregoing, might be made to yield, each in its proper field, contributions to "the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men." I am aware that voluntary lectureships have not always been found to succeed. But, in the foundation of these, considering the time and all concomitant circumstances, there seems reasonable ground for anticipating success. The plan would imply that the lecturers to be also appointed by the president and senate. It would imply that they were to be selected from the command and assistance, and admit of the exclusive devotion of their time to the studies and investigations of their post. They might even be laid under the restriction of not engaging in other pursuits, as our laws interdict the revenue officers from trading. Genius being of all countries, and the intentions of the founder peculiarly expanded, the range of our own and other countries would be open for selecting the incumbents. The desire of fame, increased by the hope of their lectures being published, might be expected to stimulate them to exertion; and if incentives so high were wanting, the tenure of their appointments, were the executive and public eye would be upon them, would act as a guard against slackness in their duties. If knowledge is power, power, directing knowledge, may make it efficacious. The place where the lectures were delivered would impart to them interest and dignity. If delivered when congress was in session, and not recurring to the members might be needed occasionally to attend to them from the turmoil of politics, and possibly a good influence on legislation itself might grow out of these new intellectual elements gathering about its precincts. To the public functionaries of all sorts, to distinguished foreigners and to visitors at Washington, as well as its resident inhabitants, the Smithsonian lectures might prove attractive. It will have been their lot, if established, to spring up when stupendous agents in nature, and new contrivances in art, are changing the state of the world, in peace and for war; when this country is taking a conspicuous share in these magnificent innovations, which some of the lectures would doubtless treat of; and when the successful results of its popular institutions hitherto are among the causes at work in modifying the political and social condition of other nations. Can it be that, delivered under such circumstances, they would be devoid of interest? Can they be so uninteresting to the nation, to which the eyes of the states are apt to turn with a curiosity both natural and ambitious, may not these lectures do their part also, if recommended by ability, towards raising up among us new homage to mental accomplishments and renown—those memorials of a nation's glory when others perish?

Each lecturer, at the conclusion of his course, to deposit with the director a copy of his lectures. These to be published or not, as determined by the board of visitors. Hence, if the audience in the lecture-rooms proved, after all, to be inconsiderable, the publication of the lectures, when of merit to authorise it, would be fulfilling the intentions of the founder, and the prospect of publication be sufficient to keep up the spirit of the lecturer. We have heard of the Bridgewater treatises, in England, emanating from the provisions of a munificent will. Perhaps it might not be too sanguine to anticipate in good time from the Smithsonian lectures, disquisitions doing honor to their authors, and let it be hoped, to their country, whilst diffusing knowledge among men every where. We have seen also the publications that issue from those recently formed associations that hold their annual meetings in Europe, and seem to have made a fashion there, enrolling statesmen, and nobles, and kings among its votaries. May not the Smithsonian institution mark an occasion for our country to start in this rivalry of mind? The race among nations is going on, of wealth, of power, and of science; the two first extending as the last extends. An immense achievement, which the present year has finally witnessed, the crossing of the Atlantic by steam, is a revolution in human affairs. Distance, once an element in our safety, as in all our relations with the old world, and the basis of all our real essential maxims in our policy, has disappeared. Europe has suddenly become neighbor to us, for good and for evil, involving consequences that baffle all foresight. Our statesmen must wake up to the mighty change. There is no time to lose. They will have to ask themselves what are the parts of our policy to be accommodated to the change. Our men of science, feeling new excitements from this approximation of the hemispheres will naturally be on the alert, growing more emulous in their several fields. The continent that Columbus found was a desert, overspread with barbarous people and institutions. The continent that steam has found teems with civilization, fresh, advancing, and unavoidably innovating upon the old world. The statesmen, the warriors, the active and enterprising men, the whole people of the two worlds, now almost confront each other. It is our point in the destinies of America that the Smithsonian institution comes to us. By their physical resources we know the United States are well known. Their resources of intellectual and moral strength have been more in the back ground; but may not an auspicious development of them be aided by an institution like this, rising up in their capital simultaneously with this new condition of things, guarded, as it will be, by the annual watchfulness, fostered by the annual care, and improved, from time to time, by the superintending wisdom of congress?

The usefulness of the institution would doubtless be increased, if young men could be regularly educated at it. But here imperious obstacles seem to interpose. If only, in conclusion, touch this part of the plan, without dilating upon it, it is from a fear that the fund would not bear their maintenance, in connexion with what has seemed to me other indispensable objects. Perhaps a limited number of students, from the age of 15, taken equally from the different states, save two, from England, under the federative principle, might come to the institution, be formed into a class, and attend its lectures for a couple or three courses; their expenses to be paid under such restrictions as the government might prescribe, and the young men to undergo public examinations at the end of the term, prize metals being awarded by the board of visitors, or a committee of congress, to keep the tone of ambition high. But would the fund bear even this? Again, I fear not.

In the foregoing suggestions as to the nature of the institution, sent to you in compliance with the president's call, I have confined myself to a very general outline and a few reflections. The subject has many aspects, and I have dealt only with some of them, and those partially. It is intrinsically one on which much diversity of opinion may be expected to prevail, and that hardly any discussions could exhaust. However, in response to the president's call, and desirous of responding to it adequately, I have felt incompetent to the task of going into the arrangements in detail necessary to the complete organization of an institution designed by its philanthropic founder to be so universal in scope, so far reaching in its benefits. It ought to have all the simplicity compatible with its ends; but these are momentous, since they may run, by their effects, into distant ages. It is like a new power coming into the republic—it is like a new power coming into the human mind, its ends still the triumphs of the mind; its fields of glory beneficent and saving—a power to give new force to the moral elements of our institutions, helping to illustrate, strengthen, and adorn them. Such, in my humble conception, it is, or may be made. Even as to the brief outline I venture upon for the plan of such an institution, I must repeat how greatly I distrust myself, as yet, as it has been, without consultation with others, giving their thoughts to the same subject, who might have corrected, modified, and improved my own. Many of these can be turned to the least profit in abler hands, or serve to start better ones in better minds. I shall be amply rewarded.

I beg to add that this communication would have been sooner sent to you, but for interruptions incident to the first month or two after returning to my home after a two years' absence.

With great respect, I have the honor to be your obedient servant,
RICHARD RUSH.

College Hill, D. C. November 26, 1838.

SIR: In an interview I had with you some time since, you desired me to express my views respecting the anticipated Smithsonian institution. I will therefore attempt to do so, though conscious of my inability to do justice to a subject so important in its character and relations. It is wisely organized, and supplied with a corps of distinguished professors in the various departments of learning, it will affect not only the highest interests of our country, but its influence will be felt in foreign lands, and its influence in character worthy of its liberal founder, let it be sustained with the zeal and liberality becoming the object and our own reputation, and it will add to our national points of union; in these we are not very rich, and, therefore, should be glad to multiply them, to bind together more firmly the elements of the American confederation. The object of the contemplated institution is "the cultivation and diffusion of knowledge among mankind." This object, I believe, is distinctly expressed in the will of Mr. Smithsonian. In making his will, he probably had his eye upon those modern institutes and universities in Europe which are designed, not to teach the first elements of science and letters, but to receive graduates, and men looking forward to professional eminence, for the purpose of advancing them to the highest grades of learning, and thus to give them power to enlarge the boundaries of knowledge, by fresh discoveries, and investigations. We may conclude, then, that the intentions of his bequest should be applied to the erection of an institution for liberal and professional purposes, and for the promotion of original investigation—to carry scholars through a range of studies much above those of the ordinary collegiate course. I am happy to know that this is the opinion of John Quincy Adams, a gentleman whose judgment in the present case is entitled to all respect.

Admitting that this is to be its object, it is natural to inquire, in the next place, how it should be organized so as most fully to promote this design. In organizing it, respect should be had to the spirit of the present age, to the genius of our government, and to our peculiar wants as a nation. It is of vital moment that it should receive such a shaping as will best correspond with all the particulars. Many of the institutions of learning in Europe, in rightly adapting to systems of government and industry, and to the benefits of commerce, and to our own, do not send forth men fitted to meet the exigencies of modern society. Though richly endowed, and supplied with teachers of great powers and attainments, they serve for little else than to show the strength of the current that is setting by them. We, at this day, and especially in this country, need men who are acquainted with something better than the learning of the ancient schools; men who have studied profoundly the relation of scientific principles to practical purposes, and who can teach their fellow-men how to apply them in advancing the public welfare.

The general superintendence of the institution may be committed to a board of commissioners, appointed by government, to hold their offices during good behavior, and with power to perpetuate their existence. In this way, the institution would not only be free from the evils of frequent changes and political agitations, but would secure to itself, in the highest degree, the benefits of permanent obligation. These commissioners would feel a deep sense of their responsibility, and that their powers and permanency in place were given to them that they might have the best opportunity to make the institution what it ought to be—a distinguished honor to their country, and a blessing to the world.

Let this board of commissioners procure the best men that can be found to fill the several professorships that may be instituted; and, in order to secure the services of men of the first powers and attainments to lecture and conduct investigations in their appropriate departments, let their several means to facilitate their studies be ample, and their stated salaries liberal; and then its public course of lecturing will be most fully attended—numbers being allured both by the fame of the professors and the lightness of the fees. It was in consequence of high salaries that the university of Göttingen, in the 15th century, rose to the first eminence in Germany.

As the funds are not now, nor are they likely to be for some time to come, sufficient to support professorships in the whole circle of science, it will be necessary to make a selection. The temptation will be to undertake too much. A few chairs, well fitted and well sustained, would effect more than a number far greater than there are adequate means to support. In deciding upon the branches of knowledge to be taught, I would select those that would make the institution as much American as a regard for general science will allow. In addition to the ordinary professorships of law, of medicine, of the exact sciences, and physics, of classical literature, and of modern languages, &c. I would have one of the English literature, one of American history, one of American constitutional law and jurisprudence, one of American institutions, one of civil engineering and architecture, one of the practical application of the exact sciences to the mechanic arts.

You will perceive that I have said nothing about professorships in the department of metaphysics. I would rather leave the whole business of ethical and moral philosophy to be taught elsewhere, than to introduce it as a distinct course in a national institution of learning.

Some of the above professorships are of a local and novel character; but this, I trust, will not be urged as an objection against them. The achievement of our independence formed an epoch in the political world. Let, then, the institution of this our first national university form an epoch in the republic of science. Much might be said in recommending the branches appropriate to our country. They are such as ought to be adopted, out of a regard to our reputation and to our present wants and future prospects. What have we done, as yet, to enrich and improve our own tongue? Besides, when we consider that the English language embodies, perhaps, richer treasures of science and literature than any other, and when we consider that it is spoken by two of the most commercial, enterprising, and powerful nations upon the earth—and which are doing more than any other two that can be named, in forming colonies, and in diffusing knowledge and the light of Christianity—how powerful is the motive to cultivate and carry it to the highest state of refinement and power.

With regard to buildings, it may be remarked that it would be wisest to erect no more than are necessary for the library, the apparatus, a cabinet of minerals, collection of models, specimens, curiosities, &c. for the accommodation of the professors when lecturing or engaged in their investigations. The scholars, instead of eating in common, might be accommodated in private boarding-houses. If this course be pursued, the interest which has accrued and which will accrue on the bequest, before the institution can be organized, will probably be sufficient to erect all the necessary buildings, and leave a handsome sum to be expended upon a library, apparatus, &c. so that the whole of the original donation may be invested for permanent fund.

It will be of vital moment that the professors and students should be rich in the external means of knowledge—an extensive and well-chosen library, instruments, apparatus, models, specimens, &c. Especially would I recommend that there should be an astronomical observatory connected with the institution. The expense of this would not be very great, and the government are already in possession of many of the requisite instruments. By such means, a meridian may be established, not only for our own country, but for the western continent. To this all our national surveys, our charts, &c. may be referred. Astronomical observations might be made, for which our position and climate offer peculiar advantages. There is now no observatory worth naming in this part of the world. Let, then, the American government now build one, and it will not only be an honor to the nation, but it will be a powerful reason for giving permanency to the present act of government.

It may not be thought best to employ any artificial means for stimulants to rivalry, and to seek for literary honors. Congress will always have the right of visitation, and they can, if they please, direct the committee whom they may appoint to attend the stated examinations of the various classes, to award medals, or some other mark of distinction, to those scholars who shall give the best proof of proficiency, or the ablest essays on appointed subjects. But it should be remembered that the community at large constitute, in fact, the most efficient board of overseers, and that that institution will be the most honored and frequented which sends forth the best prepared and the most faithful agents to meet the wants of their country. I have the honor, sir, to be yours, with sentiments of great respect and esteem,
G. CHAPIN.

To Martin Van Ewen, president of the U. States.

CHRONICLE.

Light houses on the coast. It is stated in the Boston papers, that Mr. Pleasanton, first auditor of the treasury, with Mr. Senator Davis of Mass. accompanied by the collector of the port of Boston, embarked at that port a day or two ago, on board the revenue cutter Hamilton, on a voyage of survey, authorized by the government of the United States, with a view to introducing uniformity and other improvements in the light houses on our coast.

Beacon on the Romer shoals. During the last session of congress an appropriation of $20,000 was made for the purpose of erecting a beacon on the Romer shoal, at the entrance of the harbor of N. York; and our worthy and enterprising fellow citizen, captain Winslow Lewis, is now engaged in carrying the intention of congress into effect.

The Romer shoal is an extensive sand bank, situated about four or five miles N. N. W. from the light house on Sandy Hook, and exposed to all the fury of the gales of the Atlantic. It was upon this shoal that the steamer Hogue struck when leaving New York, on her last voyage, which proved fatal to so many of her passengers and crew.

The beacon will be erected on the south east part of the shoal—where the water is nine feet deep at low tide; it will be of a conical shape, 26 feet in diameter at the base, and 6 feet at the top, to be built of large blocks of heavy granite, strongly clamped and dovetailed together, with copper materials—and rising to the height of 10 feet from the foundation of hard sand. This will be surmounted with a spar 24 feet in height, on the top of which will be placed a conspicuous object—the whole to be painted in a manner that will attract attention.

We understand that capt. Lewis has met with some difficulties in laying the foundation stones for this beacon, owing to the rocky nature of the soil. His attempts to make use of a diving bell proved fruitless. These obstacles, however, he has surmounted by an ingenious and admirable contrivance, something on the principle of the coffee-dam—and which has enabled him to execute the work of laying the foundation in the most faithful manner. A beacon of this description, on the Romer shoal, will afford a safe service to vessels entering the harbor of New York.

Prince George's county, Md. The total assessed value of the real and personal property in Prince George's county, in this state, as officially declared for the present year, is $5,384,424. There are in the county 229,260 acres of land, which with the improvements are assessed at $3,679,355; the number of slaves is 8,962, valued at $1,665,725; the amount of silver plate is 17,177 ounces, valued at an equal number of dollars; and there is other property valued at $520,302, making the aggregate assessed value of personal property, $2,295,073. On the entire aggregate, a tax of 34 cents per hundred dollars has been levied, which produces $20,097—the total amount of the county expenses for the year.

Monument at North Point. The military companies of Baltimore have resolved to erect a monument at North Point to commemorate the battle fought there on the 19th of Sept. 1814. The project is a laudable one, for few battles fought during the war were more honorable to our citizen soldiery or tendered more to check the inroads of a ruthless enemy.

Canada prisoners. Eleven more of the Prescott prisoners have been released, and have reached Sackett's Harbor. Their names are David Deffield, J. M. Jones, Oliver Lawton, Elgar Rogers, Garrus Powers, Samuel Livingston, Truman Chipman, Levi Chipman, John Graves, Alonzo Mallitt and Baptiste Jason.

At Toronto, on the 22d ult. Philip Jackson, Diogenes McKenzie, Benjamin Warner, Isaac Mace and John McIntyre, the last of the above named, were taken prisoner in the invasions of Upper Canada—with the exception of one named Myers, who was in a dying state—were tried and found guilty on the testimony of Samuel Woods and William Carroll, who were implicated in the same enterprise but admitted as evidence for the crown. Sentence had not been pronounced.

The Gloucester, Mass. Telegraph says one or two vessels have returned from the bay without any mackerel, which the Telegraph considers pretty good evidence of the scarcity of the fish. We should think so. The argument is logical and well considered. If no mackerel were found, we too, should consider the proof prima facie, at least, that they were not very abundant. Some of the places on Cape Cod, however, where they angle for them with seines, furnish pretty good fishing. For instance, the Squam Company recently took from seventy-five to a hundred mackerel in a haul. Of course, it is not to be thought of as a miracle, but that they have a poor appetite this season. They want bite, though they have no objection to being taken if you fairly surround them with a seine. They have no notion of volunteering, but submit cheerfully to impressment.

Health of New Orleans. The Bulletin of the 22d ultimo says:

We have this far advanced into the dangers of the summer season with entire immunity. The city, as we learn from conversation with several intelligent and experienced physicians, continues totally free from epidemic disorders, and altogether is marked by excellent health. The abundant rains which have of late fallen, have tempered the fervid heats of summer, and rendered the atmosphere comparatively mild and delightful. We have had quite a sufficient quantity of rain for the purpose of thoroughly cleansing the streets, and keeping up public salubrity. More would be dangerous, and we hope that we are to remain exempt from any epidemics, or visitations for some weeks to come. Hitherto we have had no signs of yellow fever, and though it must be acknowledged that all prognostics are frequently falsified by facts, we are not without the confident belief that we shall this year be spared the calamity of an epidemic.

There were 121 deaths in Philadelphia last week—26 adults and 95 children.

There were only three deaths at Cincinnati during the week ending on the 9th ult.

Health of Charleston, S. C. The yellow, or stranger's fever is prevailing at Charleston, by which, for the week ending on the 23d ult. there were 18 deaths—5 of which were white adults.

Steamboat burnt. A ship from the Mobile Chronicle, under date of 27th July, states that a steamboat William Hurlbut, which left that city on the previous evening, with a large number of passengers and a full cargo, was burnt to the waters' edge, when about ten miles above the town. The fire originated in the hold, being first observed breaking out of the hatches. The boat was immediately run ashore, but burning was not checked, except by the passengers and crew. The cargo was entirely consumed. There was no insurance upon either boat or cargo.

Secretaries of state in Illinois. It is stated, and several facts going to prove the statement are cited, that there are at this time, three secretaries of state in Illinois. The story is that governor Carlin, growing tired of the delay of Mr. Clermand in obtaining the papers from Mr. Field, appointed a Mr. Morris, of Quincy, secretary—and that when Morris arrived in Springfield, and the attempt to take possession by a writ of replevin, failed, Morris returned home, without announcing his appointment. It is thought if Mr. Clermand succeeds in ousting Fields, Morris will oust Mr. Clermand.

[S. Louis Rep.]

Tornado in Connecticut. A destructive storm of wind and rain passed over several places in the state of Connecticut, on the afternoon of the 31st ult. It appears to have been most severely felt in the vicinity of New Haven, where some of the most substantial buildings were blown down or so injured, persons were carried through the air, and forest and fruit trees in great numbers, torn up by the roots. The Daily Herald, which notices this storm, was not published early enough on Wednesday to give a full account of the damage occasioned by the wind. At North Haven several houses were destroyed, and at East Windsor great injury was done to the crops.

In the city of New Haven itself the house of a capt. Gregory, about a mile from the state house, had all its chimneys blown down, part of the roof carried off, and its barn, fences and trees demolished. A house in the vicinity belonging to Mr. Way, was blown entirely to pieces. A small new tenement, the property of Dr. Gregory, was blown or entirely demolished. The house of Mr. Sperry was uninjured. The house of a professor Shepard was considerably injured. Several buildings in a direction west from the city were blown down or greatly injured, and at one place several lives were lost.

A family had just sat down to dinner in the basement of a small house, when the wind struck the house carried it away, leaving the family and table untouched.

The precise direction taken by the current of wind we have not been able to learn.

Slow promotions in time of peace. By examining the Navy Register, it is found that there are now in the navy 127 lieutenants, who have been twenty years and upwards in service, and that twenty of these entered the service twenty-seven years ago. There are also 79 passed midshipmen, who have been in the service 11 years and upward, and are still waiting for promotion.

A locomotive engine was tried at Lowell, (Mass.) a few days since, which drew a train of cars, six or seven in number, filled with merchandise, weighing three hundred and thirty-three tons, of 2,000 pounds, over an ascent of 10 feet to the mile, at the rate of nine miles an hour.

Mississippi direct trade. Last week we noticed the arrival of the ship Franklin, from Grand Gulf at Liverpool. Since then, we observe that the ship Talleyrand, from Natchez, arrived at Liverpool on the 11th June, and the ship Victoria, from Vicksburg, on the 13th.

Colonization without cost. The legislative council of Trinidad, one of the British West India islands, in which slavery was abolished on the 1st of August, 1834, has passed an ordinance for the encouragement of the emigration of colored laborers to the island. It provides for the payment at the public expense of $25 for the passage money of each laborer of African descent coming from the United States, and $30 for each one coming from Canada.

The history of Mr. H. Bowley, a member of the legislative council of Trinidad, is now in New York as an agent to endeavor to induce the colored people to emigrate. The island of Trinidad is said to be very fertile and very healthful.

Immigration to Hayti. The brig America, Kingsley sailed 20th July from St. John's river, East Florida having on board nearly 100 free colored and some white passengers of that neighborhood for Hayti.—They were mostly of the useful and laborious classes of the community, such as agriculturists, assisted with black and white mechanics, together with some first rate ship builders and other mechanics, intending to settle near Port au Plate, under the patronage of Mr. Kingsley, a Florida planter, who wishes to transfer their industry to his own fertile lands in Hayti.

The ship Salada, about to sail from Norfolk for Liberia, will carry out among other emigrants eighteen emancipated slaves lately belonging to John K. Mir, esq. of Raleigh, N. C. who were liberated on the condition of their emigrating to that colony.

The new packet ship Rochester made her passage out in sixteen days. She sailed from New York on the 6th ultimo, and arrived at Liverpool on the 22d.

Abolition. The conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, which convened at Washington, Pa. adjourned on the 26th ult. after a session of nine days. The following resolution, which had been sanctioned by the New York conference, was considered and rejected—nays 86, yeas 5.

Resolved, That no person can, or should be, a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, who either holds, buys or sells a negro slave or slaves, unless the express object of liberating them immediately.

A line of Brazilian steam packets has been established by a company at Rio de Janeiro, for the purpose of keeping up a regular communication with all the ports north of the capital. The first packet, belonging to the company, returned from Rio de Janeiro, having made the circuit of the ports, going and returning, in sixty days.

The Wilmington Whaling company's ship North America, capt. Simmons, arrived on the 6th inst., with a full cargo of oil. The North America has been out but 14 months, and has made one of the most successful voyages on record. In addition to the oil, with which she is completely filled, she has brought home about $1,500 in specie, the proceeds of some oil sold at Hobart's bay. She filled up the vacuum on her passage home.

The Louisianaian of the 24th ult. states, that on the 6th inst. the steward of a Spanish schooner, on a coasting voyage from Havana to Trinidad de Cuba, with a crew of negroes, and twenty-six white passengers, men, women and children, managed to excite the blacks against the whites; the latter were all murdered, together with the officers and crew of the schooner. As soon as this news reached Havana, the government dispatched a vessel of war in search of the coaster.

An old newspaper. The Pittsburgh Gazette of Monday last, announces that on that day, the Gazette completes fifty-three years since the publication of the first number. It was the first newspaper which was published in that vast region which extended from the Alleghany mountains on the east, to the Pacific ocean on the west, and from the Gulf of Mexico on the south to the frozen regions of the north.

Indian running. At the Laprairie races, last week, eight Indians entered for a foot race, one of whom ran the distance—a mile and sixty yards—in five minutes and fifteen seconds. In another heat the same swift runner did it in five minutes and two seconds, with apparent ease. The running was not equal to Stannard's ten miles within the hour.

National road. The Cumberland road convention, composed of delegates from the states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, met at Terre Haute, Ia. on the 8th July. The object of the convention was, if possible, to concert measures by which the road shall be prosecuted to completion. A committee of the convention reported a memorial to be presented to the next congress, which was accordingly adopted. Among other things set forth in the memorial is the doctrine, that the government stands pledged to complete the work, in justice to the western states, referring to the large appropriations annually made for the improvement of eastern states, in clearing out of harbors, erection of light houses, &c.

American copper. Some notice is taken in the Batesville (Arkansas) News, of the operations of the Current river copper mining company. The mine at present has been neglected, but it is situated in a rich country, Missouri, and the copper ore is supposed to extend over a space of many miles. Since September, 1837, about 1,000,000 pounds of ore have been raised, the average yield of which has been about forty per cent. A smelting furnace was erected in April last, since which time about seventy-five tons of copper have been melted, but the ore is situated in such a manner, that the ore is situated in a rich country, Missouri, and the copper ore is supposed to extend over a space of many miles. ELECTIONS. We have not received official returns of the recent congressional elections, but the following summary will be found nearly correct:

In North Carolina, seven whigs and six friends of the administration have been elected. In Kentucky, eleven whigs and two friends of the administration. In Indiana, two whigs, four friends of the administration, and one, (Mr. Wick), whose position is not satisfactorily "defined." In Tennessee, seven whigs and six friends of the administration. From Alabama we have news from only the two of the districts, which states that two whigs and one friend of the administration have been elected.

Mr. Polk has, no doubt, been elected governor of Tennessee by a handsome majority; and it is believed that a majority of the delegates elect are friends of the administration.

The result is a decided whig loss—the particulars of which will be given in our next.

THE CHEROKEE TROUBLES. We have seen a letter, hastily written, from the Cherokee nation, west of Arkansas), on the 24th of June. The information it gives is to be relied on, and is the first questionable intelligence that has come to hand. It confirms the report of the destruction of the two agencies and Boudinot, but gives no particulars of the immediate cause. From certain expressions in the letter, we should infer that their death was resolved on in a general assembly, which Mr. Ross strove curbed, but could not; for the writer speaks of the constraints attempted in vain to be imposed by "the moderation of Mr. Ross."

The succession of events, as stated in the letter, are as follows:

A general council of the representatives and people of the Eastern and Western Cherokees was convened for the purpose of forming a union of the two nations, and of remodelling their government. It closed on Friday, the 21st of June, without effecting the objects for which it was convened. The people, however, who formed a branch of the general council, expressed their sentiments on the subject. They resolved that the interests of the nation required such a union to be speedily effected, and held a national convention to take the subject into consideration at an early day.

On Saturday, June 22d, major Ridge, John Ridge and Elias Boudinot, were killed.

On Sunday, June 23d, news spread among the people that Bell, one of the Ridge party, was collecting a company to kill John Ross and Edward Gunter. An hour's notice a large band assembled at the tent whence our informant writes, and started at speed to guard Mr. Ross; and from a few miles off another company went, in like haste, to guard Mr. Gunter.

On Monday, June 24th, a person who passed the agency guarded.

"For the sake of humanity," says the very intelligent gentleman from whose letter, written on the 4th, we derive our information, "it is to be hoped matter will stop here; for there can be no doubt it, should Mr. Ross or Mr. Gunter be killed, the regular army will burst all the restraints imposed by the moderation of Mr. Ross, and nothing short of utter extermination of the treaty men will satisfy them."

The convention for the union of the Eastern and Western Cherokees was to have met on Monday, 17th inst. [New York Journal of Commerce.]

FROM GUATEMALA OR CENTRAL AMERICA. From the New York Journal of Commerce. Our readers are aware that, some months since, the states of Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica, each declared itself independent of the general government, at the head of which is president Morazan. Honduras and Nicaragua raised an army of 1,600 men, and invaded the province of San Salvador. Men, gave them battle, and defeated them with the loss of about 400 men. In consequence of this battle, the nullifiers abated their pretensions, and there was some hope of the restoration of peace without further bloodshed. The government of Guatemala has addressed a circular to the other states, inviting them to a general convention for the purpose of adopting a new constitution, and effecting the desired reforms in a pacific manner. El Tiempo, of Guatemala, says, under date of May 24th, "The election of deputies for several districts has taken place without any great commotion or loss of lives, so generally attended on such occasions." The latest intelligence, which we find in the Blize Advertiser of the 13th ult. is as follows: Central America. The last papers, dated 30th May, received from that place, inform us that gen. Morazan was at the head of the federal army, a well disciplined and "full of fight" body of men. Gen. Ferrera, of the allied pacificator army, was in San Miguel on the 21st May, reorganizing the troops under his command, in consequence operations, as he says, "against the enemies of the sovereignty and independence of the states who keep San Salvador under the most shameful slavery."

As is usual with this unfortunate people, bulletins and proclamations are being daily issued, expressive of the utmost brotherly and loving kindness towards one another whilst meditating the most sanguinary butchery.

MEXICO. Advices from the city of Mexico to the 8th, and Vera Cruz to the 13th of July, have been received at New Orleans. The report that gen. Bravo had superseded Santa Ana in the presidency of ad interim that republic, turns out a hoax. General Bustamante was daily expected in the capital, having quitted for the present, the most formidable enemy of the internal peace of his country. He had been received with every demonstration of joy and respect, in all the populous places through which he had passed.

Our minister, Mr. Ellis, was received with all the honors that could be shown him at Vera Cruz.—A military escort was sent to conduct him to Mexico, and the public authorities seemed anxious to make every possible demonstration of respect towards him.

The Mexican congress had refused to concur with Santa Ana in his hostile measures towards Texas recommended by him, and the latter had retired to his country seat.

From the New Orleans Bulletin.
By the schooner Eclipse, capt. Delaville, which arrived here yesterday, we have received our files of papers and letters from the city of Mexico to the 8th, and from Vera Cruz to the 13th inst. inclusive. Santa Ana was still the president ad interim, and though in a precarious state of health exercising the functions of his office with increasing aplomb and success. At the date of our correspondent's letter, Bustamante was momentarily expected in the capital. The expedition to Tampico being crowned with such entire success, his return was every where greeted with the most enthusiastic demonstrations of affection and regard. According to the Diario del Gobierno, Santa Ana and he are to effect the most salutary reform in the constitution,—to do away with the cause of the late disastrous disaffection, conciliate all parties, and to crown the whole with reconquering the "ungrateful colony." For accomplishing this great undertaking, the executive is to be empowered to raise the necessary means. All the federalists who gave themselves up to the disposal of the government are to retire to their farms, and never to reside in a city, or near a fortification under pain of death.

Urrea was sentenced by Santa Ana to be banished for six years, but a perverse man of "French descent," who had him in charge, allowing him too much parole of honor, the quandam generalissimo, while on his way to Vera Cruz for embarkation, made his escape at Perote on the 30th ult. and has not been heard of since.

Lemes was chased out of Monterey by Canalizor; he and his brother fled to Monclavo. According to the papers in our possession, the career of this general is of late marked by much barbarity.

In several states in the interior, the small pox is raging with great violence.

Throughout the whole republic, the censorship of the press is maintained with the greatest rigor, but the foreign merchants resident in Vera Cruz have been allowed, and are about establishing a splendid exchange or reading room in that city, on the European plan.

Extract from the correspondence of the Louisianian.
No news in the interior, St. Ana is expected shortly in his hacienda de nanga del clavo. Bustamante should be on his way to Mexico to take the reins of government.

Two hundred thousand dollars of the second instalment are on the way from Mexico to Vera Cruz. The Mexicans give this the greatest punctuality.—This money will arrive only a few days after being due.

Commercial affairs have a good appearance.—There has not been as yet any arrivals from Europe, and the want of goods is immense.

General Urrea is to go to Europe.

FLORIDA. Seizure of Indians. Extract of a letter, received this morning from lieutenant W. K. Hanson, of the 7th Infantry, U. S. A. dated Savannah, August 11, 1839.

"I am now on a U. States steambot at Savannah, having in charge forty-six Seminoles, prisoners of war, who were captured by me, at Fort Mellon, last week. Let me give you the particulars: On the 31st July, I received intelligence at Fort Mellon of the massacre of the dragoons on the Caloosahatchie. The Indians, you probably know, have been visiting me at Fort Mellon, during the summer, and a considerable number were in the fort at the time when the news reached me. I carefully concealed from them the intelligence which I had received, and continued giving them provisions as before. They showed, however, some little distrust, and did not visit me again for two days. On the afternoon of the 8d August, forty-five of them came to the fort to receive rations. They looked cautiously about the fort, and finding nothing suspicious, sat themselves down at my door in their usual fashion. The soldiers loitered about the garrison with an attitude of carelessness, and there were no signs save the most pacific. Presently, I discharged a pistol, as if by accident. That was the signal! The gates of the fort were closed as if by magic, and the Indians in a moment surrounded by the troops. The Seminoles made a start to escape, and two of their men broke through the circle of soldiers. They both dropped dead beneath a heavy discharge of musketry, which cut them in pieces. The remainder of the Indians then quietly surrendered.

"None of my men were injured. Two of the Indians were killed, as I have mentioned, and the others were unharmed. The steambot came up two days after, much to my relief, as my force was so very small that had I been attacked from the outside, self-preservation would have compelled me to execute the men prisoners. The arrival of the steambot spared me that painful duty.

"On the 3th August another Indian, with his wife and child, were captured, making in all 46 prisoners, of whom there are 14 men, the rest women and children. My men behaved well.

"I am now, with these prisoners, on my way to Fort Moultrie, Charleston harbor, where I am ordered to remain until further orders, with a detachment of troops to guard the Indians."

[Army & Navy Chron.]
One of the greatest impediments to a successful prosecution of this disastrous Florida war, and the most serious obstacle with which our army had to contend, was the want of an accurate knowledge of the topography of the country. There is no question whatever, that much of the blood and treasure that have been expended would have been saved, had a reconnaissance of the country preceded our military operations. We are likely, however, to be better prepared in future, should circumstances require another campaign. Besides the officers of the corps of topographical engineers, who were assigned to duty in Florida and have been actively employed, the officers of the line of the army have not been idle; but together they have obtained a pretty thorough knowledge of the topography of the whole territory.

Capt. Mackay and lieutenant J. Edmund Blake, of the corps of topographical engineers, have constructed a map, mostly from their own personal reconnoissances, and partly from the surveys of officers on duty in the field. From the manner in which the map is dotted, we should judge that no portion of the territory had been left unexplored. Every hammock, swamp, lake and river, is minutely traced.—The map was drawn by lieutenant Blake, with that neatness and taste for which he is so much distinguished, and we hope it will soon be published.

Some idea may be formed of the operations of our troops, from the fact that upwards of seventy forts have been established. Part of these, it is true, are now abandoned, a portion of them are merely stockades, and others again have scarcely any outward defences. Not only have those officers who have fallen victims to the foe or the climate, been remembered by having a fort called after their names, but many of the living officers who distinguished themselves are in like manner complimented. From a hasty glimpse of the map, we gathered the following names of forts: Andrews, Atkinson, Armstrong, T. B. Adams, Brooke, Butler, Basinger, Clinch, Crane, Clarke, Cross, Cooper, Christos, Crabbe, Cummings, Center, Dade, Drane, Downing, Dallas, Dulany, Davenport, Deynand, Fanning, Foster, Fraser, Fowle, Gates, Gardiner, Gatlin, Heileman, Harlee, Hanson, Hook, Izard, Jupiter, Jennings, Jackson, Roger Jones, Keats, King, Kingsbury, Lawson, (2) Lander, Lane, Lane, Lane, McCall, McCalland, Micanoni, McNeil, McClure, Macomb, (2) Pleasant, Pointsett, Pierce, Peyton, Russell, Stearns, Taylor, Thompson, Van Swearingen, White, Wheelock, Walker, Ward, Waxassassa.

Besides these, there are twenty or more forts laid out under the plan of general Taylor, of dividing the territory into squares, and named numerically.

There are in the vicinity of the Okeefeenee swamp near the southern boundary line of Georgia, fourteen military posts, viz: Forts Barnum, Dearborn, Floyd, Gilmer, Lamotte, McLane, Muse, A. S. Miller, Mudge, Monac, Norton, Tattnall, Tompkins, Walker.

[Army and Navy Chronicle.]

In the last number of the Register it was stated that the governor of Florida had appointed a deputation of several of the most prominent citizens of the territory, to proceed north and confer with the national executive on the subject of prosecuting the war against the Indians, who, it appears, pay no regard to the terms of the armistice, and comb. The editor of the Richmond Enquirer, after stating that he had a long conversation with general Brown, of Tallahassee, one of the deputation, adds—

"We are now satisfied that the Indians are in greater force, supplied with better means, and more determined on hostilities, than is generally supposed. It will become necessary to strike at them again, and drive them off. The only question is, what is the best species of force for this purpose? It seems to be the impression in Florida, that another species of force is necessary besides the regular troops or volunteer militia, who have not been acquainted with the modes of Indian warfare. Either United States mounted volunteers, from parts of the country which are familiar with the habits and mode of fighting of the Indian—and who can operate without being controlled by the United States officers, and who can with proper guides dash into the interior of the woods, &c., or entering the persons, who will be allowed to settle in portions of the public lands, upon condition of fighting the Indians and protecting the country, &c.—or, both these, and similar species of force combined, are considered the best troops for the purpose. At all events, Florida requires arms, ammunition and provisions for her own volunteers for the present. A small and bold band of about 40 men have consented to act, under a leader, to hover over the hiding places, and dash among the enemy.

They are to be allowed so much for the scalp of each Indian warrior, or a prisoner, and the money has been raised by private subscription among the people. This band is about proceeding to operations. We understand the commissioners will proceed to New York, to confer immediately with the secretary of war."

THE SIOUX AND CHIPPEWA INDIANS. The St. Louis Bulletin, of the 29th, publishes an extract of a letter from a gentleman in the Indian department at St. Peters, to a friend in that city, which says:—"The Sioux and Chippewa have had two distinct engagements on the 3d instant, at the Lake St. Croix and Rum river, some forty miles from this place, in which 35 Sioux were killed and wounded, and between 140 and 150 of the Chippewa killed.

On the 29th and 30th of June, they mutually pledged themselves at the agency to remain at peace for one year at least; but the murder of one of the Sioux near the agency, an excellent man, by the Pillager band of Chippewa, was the cause of the unfortunate affray." In relation to the exaggerated reports which were likely to be circulated, he has the following. "We are now as calm as if this unexpected storm as ever. Some busy body may, however, make a tale of this transaction, but the agents know what is what in such matters."

In relation to the above battles, the Globe, of a late date, contained the following:

In the National Intelligencer of Tuesday last, there was published an article from the St. Louis Republican, containing an extract from a letter written on the 10th of July last, at Fort Snelling, giving an account of two conflicts on the St. Croix, and above the falls of St. Anthony, between the Sioux and Chippewa, in which a number of the latter were killed. A letter of the same date, written at St. Peters' by the Indian agent, has been received at the office of Indian affairs, which does not mention the above engagements. It is inferred, therefore, that there must be some mistake about the matter, as it would have been the duty of the agent to communicate the unfortunate occurrences referred to, especially as he has charge of the interests of the Sioux. There was such a report no doubt, but the hope is entertained that it was groundless.

SAILING OF EMIGRANTS. From the Norfolk Herald of the 9th inst. The Liberia packet ship Saluda, capt. Walters, sailed, from this port on Tuesday last, bound for Monrovia, having on board a cargo of merchandise and provisions, for the colony, and about 40 emigrants, 30 of them liberated slaves, having their passages paid, and clothing, agricultural implements, &c. and twelve months provision furnished at the expense of their former owners. Also, seven young men, captured Africans smuggled into Florida by a Spanish slaver, and seized and sent on here by the U. S. marshal, to be returned back to their native land at the expense of government.

Among the cabin passengers are the rev'd. Jno. F. Pinney, the rev'd. O. K. Camfield and J. P. Alward, missionaries, who go out under the patronage of the general assembly's board of missions.

Also, Mrs. Seyes, with her two fine healthy children, born in Africa, returning from a visit to her friends in the United States, to join her husband, the rev'd. Mr. Seyes, missionary of the Methodist Episcopal board in Liberia. This is the first instance we recollect of such an increase of a white family in our African settlement.

And six other citizens of Liberia, four of them respectable merchants—one of them Colin Teague formerly of Richmond, who emigrated with his family about 19 years ago, in company with Lott Cary, in the brig Nautilus from this port; he informs us that all his family are alive and in the enjoyment of good health, and very comfortably settled and perfectly pleased with the land of their adoption.

Also, Joseph Roberts and wife: he is the son of Amelia Roberts, formerly of Petersburg, who emigrated also, from this port eleven years ago, with her family then 19 in number—13 of them are now alive and in the enjoyment of health and prosperity. The others all speak well of the state of their lands and of the prospect before them.

The Saluda being a regular packet, will return to this port in December next, for another company of emigrants.

EMIGRATION. The New York American estimates the passengers that have arrived in this country within the last twenty years at 1,000,000. The Journal of Commerce has compiled the following statement of arrivals at that port for each of the last twenty years:

Years.	Passengers.	Years.	Passengers.
1819	9,442	1829	10,064
1820	4,430	1830	30,224

NAVAL. The following vessels of war are fitting out at the navy yard at Norfolk: frigate Branlywine, com. Bolton, destined for the Mediterranean; sloop of war Torktown, recently launched, and the schooner Grampus, lieutenant com. Paine, for the West Indies. The frigate Potomac is in the dry dock undergoing repairs.

The Pensacola Gazette of the 3d inst. mentions the arrival there of the U. S. ship Levant, from a cruise to windward—all well.

The U. S. ship Vandalia also arrived there on the 3d, from a cruise of two months fifty days along the coasts of Texas and Louisiana, without going into a single port, the object of the cruise being the suppression of the slave trade. Captain Levy, finding the soundings on these coasts inaccurately laid down, for his own satisfaction has ascertained, by a careful examination, a true line of soundings, which will be of immense benefit to vessels trading as far down as Galveston.

The U. S. vessels at Pensacola, are the frigate Macedonian, and ships Ontario, Levant, Vandalia, Eric and Warren.

U. S. ship Independence, com. Nicholson, sailed from Montevideo June 12th.

The sloop of war Pride, which was launched at Porthmouth, (N. H.) a short time since, will be ready for the reception of her crew in the course of a couple of weeks.

Admiral Boudin and Commodore Shubrick. A correspondent of the Army and Navy Chronicle says, that no correct account of the affair between these two officers has yet been published. The Chronicle says that copies of the whole correspondence between them has been forwarded to the department at Washington.

THE N. E. BOUNDARY. The Bangor Courier says, that Mr. Featherstonhaugh and col. Mudge, British commissioners, have passed through this city on their way to the disputed territory, with a large quantity of surveying, astronomical and other instruments, for the purpose of ascertaining topographical and other information respecting the boundary line.

FUNERAL OF THE REV. J. B. SEIXAS. The funeral of the rev. J. B. Seixas, Rabbi-teacher of the Portuguese synagogue Shearith Israel—Remnant of Israel—in Crosby street, where officiated for upwards of eleven years, took place yesterday with more than usual pomp and display. At 5 o'clock the attendants of the funeral met at the church in Crosby street. There could not have been less than five hundred persons present, consisting of the most wealthy and influential among the Jewish people.—From thence the company proceeded to the burial ground on 21st street. There, after the seven holy steps had been taken around the coffin, which ceremony was performed by the several readers of the different synagogues of New York, a discourse was delivered by the rev. Isaac Leeser, of Philadelphia, who had journeyed to our city expressly to take part in the ceremonies of the interment.

The progression and chant being finished, Mr. Lesser commented on the virtues of the deceased, and then proceeded to point out the duties incumbent on the Israelites to fulfil, in order to render themselves acceptable to God and man. One part of his discourse we cannot refrain from giving, as it tends to dispel a very common prejudice that the Jews are not believers in a future state of being and felicity. "It is inconsistent with the justice of God, that all that we can, to aid in the welfare and happiness of our fellow beings, that our conduct will be an emblem of gratitude to the Great Creator for the manifold blessings bestowed on us. Moreover, when we pass from this earthly life, let us hope that we shall be spiritually refined, and restore unpolluted our souls to the source of light and being thereafter to enjoy permanent bliss and contentment."

The coffin was then lowered into the grave, and the nearest relative, a son of the deceased, approached and cast a shovelfull of earth upon the corpse.—A son of Mr. Seixas had to perform this sad office, and it so overcome him that he fainted. The nearest relatives in turn then approached, and each threw a portion of earth into the grave, until it was entirely filled up. The company then separated.

There is something peculiarly touching in this last ceremony. The granite back to earth that which is of earth—the animate clay casting the clod upon its source of life and being, now reduced to nothingness—the consciousness that one day the same fate will attend every looker on,—impresses with awe and reflection the most careless observer. We have witnessed many different modes of sepulture, but certainly none more solemn than the one now recorded. [New York Express.]

MR SENATOR DAVIS. The Claremont (N. H.) Eagle, speaks of senator Davis, as a suitable candidate for the vice presidency. No one would be more acceptable to the whigs of Massachusetts. He is a man whom they delight to honor.

We copy the above paragraph from the Lenox Eagle, the Claremont paper referred to having failed to reach us. This is not the first time that we have heard the name of John Davis, of Massachusetts, spoken of as a candidate for the vice presidency. Mr. Davis is one of the ablest, the purest, and the best men in the country. He is the very personification of unbending integrity, unsullied honesty, and sterling patriotism. He is admirably fitted for any station, however exalted, to which the popular voice may call him. [Boston Atlas.

THE STEAM SHIPS. The ship Europe, at New York from Liverpool, reports that on Friday, at 9 A. M. Sandy Hook distand 150 miles, she exchanged signals with the Great Western; at 10, saw the British Queen 20 miles astern. The Roscoe, also arrived at New York from Liverpool, saw at 1, P. M. on the same day, lat. 40 16, the Great Western, 195 miles from the Hook, and at 2, P. M. saw the British Queen, 193 miles from the Hook, the Great Western 13 miles ahead and about 15 miles farther south.

PROPERTY IN CINCINNATI. Thirty years ago, Ethan Stone purchased three lots of ground in Cincinnati, for which he paid fifty dollars each. He afterward sold the lots and moved into the country. Within a few weeks past he returned to the city to reside, and for one-fifth of one of the three lots before mentioned, he was obliged to give nine thousand dollars.

The foregoing short paragraph is from the Middletown Mail. It is thought to furnish a convenient peg upon which to hang a short story of the ups and downs of life, in this, our good city of Cincinnati.

Ethan Stone settled himself in Cincinnati about the year 1800, in the practice of the law, and soon made pretty extensive purchases of lands and lots. He was in due season numbered with the well to live, and upon the three lots named above, erected the buildings now occupied by Geo. W. Jones, and planted the fruit trees and shrubbery that surround it. In addition he cultivated a portion of the grounds as a garden, in which choice fruits and flowers had their departments. In the accompaniments the best table vegetables. Mr. Stone advanced to be squire Stone, was president of the bank of Cincinnati, and marked down as a Cincinnati millionaire. But then came the reverses of 1818—and 1820 extended. And Mr. Stone had been liberal in his endorsements for friends, and in assuming responsibilities to sustain the bank of which he was president, and the crash came upon him. His mansion and his garden, his shrubbery and his fruit grounds were surrendered to the monster, and Mr. Stone from almost a paradise and palace, removed to a shanty of rough planks, planted on the hill side at the commencement of the narrows, below Mill creek. Before winter he completed a small brick building, into which he removed, and occupied it as did the cobbler his stall.

"It served him for kitchen, for parlor and hall."

In 1836 the monster came back to Cincinnati, and property again began to fetch a price. Mr. Stone still retained some refuse remnants which gradual changes converted into a little hoard of wealth. And in progress of time, he erected a comfortable mansion, in addition to his beginning, and surrounded himself with garden and shrubbery, and orchard, and all the permanent curtilages of an established home. Convinced that this home was located where it might remain undisturbed, he had set himself, at seventy years of age, to rest in peace the remainder of his life. When here came a navigable canal marching up the Ohio river, and sweeping in its course, the garden and the shrubbery, and the orchard, and cutting away the mansion to its first constructed apartment. And Mr. Stone is again turned out of doors, and compelled to find a new home. When he returns to purchase in the city, he finds himself required to pay at the rate of fifty thousand dollars for a property purchased thirty-five years ago at sixty dollars. Thus is every thing around us effected by the ten thousand conjoint operations of trade which build up cities and construct channels of communication with them, producing results that would seem to leave the lamp of Aladdin no longer an extravagant fable. [Cincinnati Gazette.

SALE EXTRAORDINARY. "The sad remains of beauty once admired"—the dresses, ornaments, gewgaws and trinkets—which were once wont to beautify the person of the well known tragedian Thomas Cooper, esq., were all sold at auction, by Jesse Cady, on Monday last, he and his daughter having abandoned the stage and entered upon the field of morus multicaulis culture.

It may in many a waking some reminiscences of bygone times, and to others prove not uninteresting, if we give the price at which some of the veteran's "regiments" were disposed of.

The whole stock was divided into 194 lots, some of which contained several, and others but a single article.

Lot No. 14, a buff kersey shirt and steel stlap. Breastplate, white under shirt, full dress for Virginius, $7 75

No. 34 was a crimson satin Spanish shape, richly trimmed with spangles and studs slashed with blue silk and satin 15 00

Further on the catalogue was a costly and magnificent regal shirt, splendidly trimmed with silver and spangles, 35 00

A green cloth regal shirt, with white kersey under shirt, full sleeves, richly spangled and trimmed with steel studs, spangles and leather, 45 00

A splendid black silk velvet Hamlet's dress jacket, fully trimmed, most magnificently beauteous, 75 00

A splendid white cloth Greek dress, richly trimmed with spangles and studs, crimson shirt and white do, trimmed, 35 00

A buff kersey and purple velvet Roman dress, elegantly spangled and trimmed with lions heads, 35 00

A splendid coat, trimmed with silver, a pair of breeches, and a foistone spangled vest for sir Peter Teazle, 17 00

Lot No. 100 was a splendid suit of chain and stud armour complete, shoes, gauntlets, leg and knee pieces, all complete. 46 00

A complete sir John Falstaff's dress, with a stuffing and breastplate, hat, feathers, &c. 25 00

A regal robe of crimson velvet, richly trimmed with gold and silver leather studs and spangled, 15 00

Many of the articles of stage jewelry, trinkets, &c. were purchased not by professional people, but by citizens generally, as a memento of their former wearer.

A handsome Greek sword, of a very antique pattern, said to have been made for Talma, richly mounted with silver, and cost when new $80, was knocked down to Edwin Forest at fifteen dollars.

A genuine Indian Tomahawk was also purchased by Mr. Forest.

The jewelry and ornaments generally brought a very high price.

The dresses were mostly made by Mr. Palmer, the celebrated costumer of Drury Lane theatre, London. Many of them, however, were made by Mr. John G. Taylor, of this city. [N. Y. Courier.

THE MASCAL PLANT. If the description below be not very much exaggerated, our gardeners should lose no time in producing the mascal plant.

This extraordinary vegetable production, (a description of which has never been published,) is said to be found on the Rio Grande, and its tributary streams, N. W. of the Mexican republic. It grows spontaneously on the most barren and sterile mountains in that country, and is as much esteemed as an article of food by the Mexican Indians, as is the buffalo and the deer, by their more northern neighbors. The mascal grows in the shape of a cabbage head, and may be found as large in size as a half barrel; it is thickly covered with sharp prickly protuberances to the length of from twelve to eighteen inches, the root is very small, the head has also a thick covering of leaves, much resembling in shape those of the plantain tree, which are very juicy, and when prepared for eating in the same manner as the head, afford a sweet and nutritious beverage, answering every purpose to ally thirst.

The process used for cooking this plant is very singular, yet if digressed from in a single instance the mascal is spoiled and rendered unfit for use: it consists of digging a hole or pit in the ground to the depth of four or five feet, which must be covered with a layer of heated rocks on which the mascal is to be placed with the root downward, a thick coat of leaves and bushes must be thrown over the mouth of the pit, over all of which is to be laid a thin coat of dirt just sufficient to prevent the heat from escaping. In this situation must the mascal remain (according to Indian computation) for three days and three nights, when it may be taken out and will be found perfectly cooked, and most delicious. In flavor it resembles a ripe mellow peach, each succeeding day adding to its good qualities; it increases in excellence by age. On this plant alone do the Indians subsist for months, being perfectly satisfied with their food, and esteeming it above all other. About half a pound of mascal is by them deemed sufficient to satisfy the cravings of hunger for a day, and is always carried with them on their hunting and other excursions—as I before observed the leaves of this flavored plant contain a rich and beautiful beverage, although forming a most extraordinary combination of food and drink, thus affording another illustration of the beneficence of a kind Providence in securing even to the wild and untutored savage a luxury which their more favored and civilized brethren might well envy.

I have seen the mascal so thick in some places as to form an almost impenetrable forest of thorns, so formidable in appearance as would be the same number of glittering spears covering the whole expanse of the country as far as the eye could see, in travelling through which the incautious or unwary will be reminded by a gentle stab, of the necessity there is to have a care.

I may also mention that many of the peasantry of the states of Lanora and Chihuahua, bordering on this country, also cultivate the mascal in their fields and gardens, and I have been informed distil it into liquor, which is said to be excellent and not inferior to the best Jamaica rum. [St. Louis Argus.

LATER FROM ENGLAND.

An arrival at Boston, briggs latter, and not less gloomy, news from England.

The cotton market is said by the Boston papers to be lower, but it must be observed that the fall of 1d. noticed in the Liverpool report is the fall of the whole week, and that there was a slight revival in consequence of a withdrawal of a large quantity of the staple. So that the news does not materially differ from that brought by the British Queen.

From the Boston Courier.

Three days later from Liverpool. The fast sailing ship Oneco, capt. Drew, arrived below on Saturday morning, in twenty-seven days from Liverpool, whence she sailed on the 13th ult. We are indebted to the politeness of capt. Drew for Liverpool papers to his day of sailing, and a London journal of the 10th—the latter, however, is no later than the London papers received by the British Queen.

We find no local or political news of any moment. The commercial intelligence, it will be seen, is no better than that received by the British Queen. Cotton had sustained another fall in price, as will be seen on reference to the report of the Liverpool market.

Letters from Rome state that a large promotion of cardinals was to take place on the 8th of July.

Mr. Samuel Spring, well known in the theatrical circles, died on Sunday last.

A public dinner will be given to Mr. Macready, on the 20th inst. in testimony of the sense entertained of the zeal, taste, genius, and liberality he has devoted to the drama of his country, eminently shown in his revival of Shakspear's plays." The duke of Somerset takes the chair."

At the excise court, Samuel Ellis, of the king's arms, Roupel street, Lambeth, was fined £300 for adulterating his beer, and for attempting to bribe the officers who detected him. The penalty for the adulteration was £100, and the further fine of £200 was imposed for the attempt to bribe.

The seaman of her majesty's steamer Medea, who had his leg shot off a short time since in the accidental encounter of that vessel with a French corvette on the coast of Mexico, has been awarded a pension of £55 per annum by the French government.

There is no foundation for the report of the death of the bishop of Litchfield and Coventry.

The chancellor of the exchequer has purchased for the national gallery a painting of Velasquez. It was exhibited last year at the British institution, and represents the arena of a bull fight. It was bought from lord Cowley, and £4,000 is the sum paid for it. The picture is of the highest class, and worthy the collection in which it is to be added.

Letters from Bagdad announce an overflow of the Tigris which had laid the whole city nearly under water. It was stated that already more than 1,000 houses had been destroyed, and that the whole population, without reference to age, rank or sex, were employed in attempting to check the ravages of this inundation.

The duke of Sutherland has been appointed lord lieutenant of Salop, in the room of lord Powis, deceased. His grace is one of the largest landed proprietors in the county.

The authorities had withdrawn the military and police from the streets of Birmingham, and the town was comparatively quiet.

The crops are represented to be extremely good, and never looked better or gave greater promise of a plentiful supply.

Two females were instantly killed on the Birmingham railway, (Mrs. Yates and Mrs. Saunders). Their attention was diverted another way, to a train that was approaching them, and were not sensible of the one approaching them in an opposite direction.

The Paris papers are principally occupied in endeavors to induce the government to forego the execution of any of the insurgents of the 12th of May, who may be capitally condemned by the court of peers.

The termination of the trial of the Paris prisoners by the court of peers, is the only intelligence of any interest in the Paris journals. The president announced that on Wednesday their lordships would meet so as to pronounce sentence, so that the fate of the accused was not known.

The duke de Fezenack quitted Madrid on the 1st July, after having asked for and obtained the grand cordon of Charles III.

Madrid journals of the 3d July mention the return of the 28th June of a band of 200 Carlists.

Some letters of July 7th state that Don Carlos was still at Onate on the 4th. Nothing new had occurred at Lidio or Avbiegna.

Letters from Constantinople of the 19th ult. represent the recovery of the sultan as almost hopeless. The heir to the Ottoman throne is a young man about 18 years of age, brought up in that seclusion so common to princes of the Osmanli dynasty, of whose notions of government nothing can be known before his assumption of the imperial and pontifical authority—hence the indisposition of Mahmoud is an affair of more than ordinary interest. But the sultan's illness has not in the least cooled his ardor for war. On the contrary, he has expressed himself indifferently to the protraction of his life after seeing Mehemet Ali and his son in chains before him. The recovery of Egypt and Syria would reconcile him to the loss of Greece.

Since the last advices from Constantinople, the sultan has diffused great joy among the inhabitants, by the promulgation of a firman abolishing the government monopoly bread, and the house tax imposed for defraying the expenses of quarantine establishments. His highness has moreover commanded that to all persons who have paid the house tax, the sums paid by them shall be returned on application to the imperial treasury.

In Switzerland, the Swiss diet, in its sitting of the 4th instant, adopted the resolution of nominating a general commission to inquire into the causes of the dispute between the high and low Valais. The proposition of dividing the Canton into two states was almost universally repulsed by the deputies.

Liverpool, July 12. Cotton. The market opened with the same limited and inanimate demand as marked the close of last week, and on each day prices gradually gave way in favor of the buyers, until yesterday, when a complete panic seized the majority of the holders of American cotton, and the most irregular sales were made, but generally at 1d. per lb. below the closing prices of Friday last. At this great decline the trade bought freely, and showed an equal disposition this morning to go on with their purchases, but have been in a great measure stopped by the holders suddenly withdrawing a great proportion of the cotton that had previously been pressing, and demanding generally 1-8d. to 1-4d. per lb. advance in price. A more limited business has since consequently been transacted, but as the advance has been obtained, the market has assumed a more decided appearance, and something approaching to a correct quotation can be given. The ordinary qualities of Uplands and Orleans are now 3-4d. and the fair and good 1-2d. to 3-4d. per lb. below the currency of this day week. In Brazils and Surats, the variations have not been so great, and the decline does not exceed 1-8d. to 1-4d. per lb. In Egyptian cotton there is no change to notice. The imports of the week are 30,882 bags, and the sales for the same period, including 1,500 American taken on speculation, and 2,260 American, 50 Surat and 360 Bengal for export, amount to 21,480 bags, of which 100 Sea Island, 20 a 30 1-2; 4,390 Upland, 1 a 8; 3,190 Alabama and Mobile, 5 1/2 a 8, 8,850 N. Orleans, 5 3/4 a 9. Imports up to this date, 1839, 716,712 bags; same time, 1838, 992,786 bags.

DESCRIPTION OF A TORNADO.

The New Haven Register gives the following particular account of a remarkable storm which visited that place on Wednesday the 31st ult. The tornado began at half past eleven in the morning, and was preceded by heavy rain, with constant thunder and lightning. Its course was from the southwest to the northeast, extending over a width of from twenty to thirty rods. Its first ravages were observed in the western part of the town on the Derby turnpike, and in its progress it unroofed two or three dwelling houses, destroyed several barns and out buildings, twisted up by the roots several large elms, and destroyed gardens, fruit trees, &c. Thence its progress is thus described by the Register.

The next object of its wrath was the African church, (a wooden building), which it knocked into a thousand fragments, many of which were carried high in the air on the top of the tempest. Several small houses, standing at intervals in this part of the town, were blown to pieces as they were severally reached by the tornado, leaving in almost every instance, nothing but the foundations. In one of these houses, occupied by a Mr. Warner, his wife, the only person in the house, was washing when the storm burst upon her, and the next instant found herself in the cellar, with her kettle of boiling clothes upset beside her, and uninjured, but no part of the house to be seen! G. F. H. Read, esq. who had taken shelter in one of these buildings, is said to have had an arm broken, or badly bruised; and a woman residing in another, had her leg shattered by the falling of the house. A new house in the course of finishing, owned by Dr. Munson was blown down, and the house of Mr. Way scattered to the whirlwind. The air was now filled with rafters, boards, shingles, parts of fences, &c. gathered in the space of about two miles, and the tornado proceeded in the direction of captain Gregory's beautiful seat, which seems to have escaped the very brunt of its fury. Surrounded by fine trees and shrubbery, which checked somewhat the force of the missiles, the house itself was not as much injured as it otherwise would have been—still many of his fruit and large trees bowed before the blast, were torn up by the roots, and hurled against the fences. The roof of his house was carried to the ground—a high chimney tumbling through the floor into the very room where his family were sitting; yet they all miraculously escaped injury! His barn and out-houses were nearly demolished, and the whole appearance of his splendid grounds was as if a battery of chain shots had been poured among them. His loss must be severe. To the left of his premises, the barn of Mr. James Munson was levelled with the ground, and several large trees immediately in front of his house were dragged up by the roots, and thrown across the street. The house was not injured.

The house of his neighbor, Mr. Miles Sperry, who supports his family by raising vegetables, was cut off from the road upwards, and blown in every direction—while the family were all at home. No one injured. Its violence was so great at this point as to completely strip a flock of fowls of their feathers, which were afterwards found dead. On the right of capt. Gregory, the house of professor Charles U. Shepard, on the "Plains road," was slightly damaged, and several trees were blown down; the roof of his large barn was taken off, and carried more than a mile by the force of the blast! It had now reached the woods which extend several miles in the north part of the town, through which it passed in the rear of "Sachem's wood," the residence of James A. Hillhouse, esq. doing but little damage, except to the fences; occasionally tearing up a huge oak, or wrenching off the tops of the forest trees. Here it crossed the Hartford turnpike, throwing down a dozen or two of the old poplars which line the road, and just grazed the top of buildings, and passing to the residence of "High Belmont" (the new and splendid residence of Henry Whitney, esq.) tearing up by the roots a great many trees, and throwing down the fences. Approaching the front of the highest bluff of East Rock, the tornado diverged slightly to the north, taking up the bridge at its base, and flinging its fragments over the surrounding meadow; it passed through the gap of the mountain, about half a mile north of the "Hermits' Cave," and came out on the North Haven road, near the farm of Mr. Jabez Potter. The roof of his house was taken off, his barn and cow house blown down, and a boy, who was in the loft of the barn at the time, was hurled several rods across the street, into the Yankee's "native element," a pumpkin patch. The unceremonious manner of his exit from the barn somewhat surprised him, but he was not injured in the least. The roof the brick house of Horace Potter, esq. was blown off; the barn and the house of Mr. Lynn Potter were demolished; the roof of Mr. Chester Potter's house was lifted off, and his fine orchard completely destroyed. It then crossed the rail road, and swept over the meadow to the east of it, pitching the innumerable hay stacks into the air, and playing the same pranks with the fences.

We have not heard of any further damage, but fear that the people of Northford have had a visit from it. It is almost miraculous that no lives were lost in so great a carage. Many poor people have lost their all, and are turned out of house and home. We went over the whole breadth and length of the course we have described the next morning, and such a scene of devastation and misery we do not often see. We hope measures will be immediately taken for the relief of those who have been made penniless by this dire calamity. It is a remarkable fact, that those trees which were blown near houses fell in every instance, from the house, although towards different points.

Incidents of the storm. Almost the entire length of its course, the ground was strewn with bits of wood, cloth, household furniture, &c. &c. but not an ugl of scarcely a piece to identify the nature of the article, or the owner. The occupants of several of the houses, particularly Mrs. Warner, who was thrown with her kettle of boiling clothes into the cellar, while the house and its furniture ascended into the air, it is said, had not the next day found a single article of either their furniture or wearing apparel! Even the clothes she had on were all stripped from her back, with the exception of a strong belt about her waist, and she was left as naked as the place of dwelling was desolate. A bureau filled with wearing apparel has not been seen since the moment it left the premises, except, as is supposed, fragments at a distance of three or four miles, upon the top of East Rock—a bonnet was there found lodged in a tree, that was taken from the same place. Beds and bedsteads, pots and kettles, alike disappeared! A very heavy sheet iron fireboard, which had been used in Mr. Way's house, was found in an easterly direction, on the powder house road, in the rear of the house. A lot of blacksmith's tools were scattered in different directions—some of which have been found at a great distance from each other, east and west. A pen containing two or three good sized pigs, near capt. Gregory's, was carried away, and nothing since heard of either. The orchard of judge Darling, in the rear of his house, containing some fifty or more large thrifty trees, and field of corn adjoining, appear as if they had been pressed down by rolling a huge mountain over them—while a quantity of pole beans, situated between the trees and corn, stand perfectly erect, as if nothing had happened. A heavy plank from the bridge at the base of the rock was found, it is said, on the Middletown turnpike, on the opposite side of the mountain from where it was taken; if so, it must have been carried up about 300 feet, nearly perpendicularly, before it could have crossed. The tornado, in descending the north side of the "Rock," in the absence of other objects to break its vengeance upon, it is said, took possession of, and carried along with it, large quantities of "mother earth."

EXPLORING EXPEDITION.

We find in the Army and Navy Chronicle the following extract of a letter from a gentleman on board the ship Relief, attached to the expedition, which give some very interesting particulars of the voyage, up to the time of its date, April 10, 1839.

"We sailed from Rio de Janeiro on the 19th December for Orange Bay, in Terra del Fuego, with instructions to run a line of soundings down the coast of Patagonia. We had a delightful passage, in sight of land almost the whole time. At port St. Elena we were so near the land as to see the llamas feeding on the sides of the hills. On the 21st we were south of the sun. Christmas day was passed in lat. 23° 27' S. long. 45° 12' W. We had for dinner roast plover, partridges and green peas, all cooked in France! About the 1st of January, we began to see albatross, and occasionally a seal. On the 9th of January we were off port St. Elena, and saw the llamas; it was a delightful day, the land looked very tempting, but we could not land, not having leave. The country appears barren, no large trees, but a stumpy vegetation. The whole coast of Patagonia has the same rough and flat appearance; no thick woods to be seen; nor the least sign of inhabitants. The places called ports are uninhabited.

"On the 21st January we made cape St. Diego, Staten Land, &c. and arrived at Good Success bay, so named by capt. Cook. Here we anchored, and went on shore. The appearance of the land about the straits of Magellan was very dreary, barren and rugged rocks, mountains covered with snow, &c. Good Success is a very pleasant bay; the hills are covered with trees, principally, beach, birch and winter's bark; most beautiful barberries, with yellow flowers like small roses; bush cranberries, and a great variety of heath like shrubs. We went on shore, armed to the teeth, but no natives were seen; several butts were found, and other signs of people having been there. The next morning, however, our attention was called by a shouting on shore, where we discovered the natives. The captain and some of the officers immediately landed. After dinner I went on shore and saw about fifteen natives round a fire, with our men; they were a tall looking people, with nothing but llama's skin thrown over their shoulders. They appeared to be a simple people, and jealous, and not allowing us to go in the direction we supposed their women and children were. They were evidently Patagonians, being taller than the tallest of our men; they had bows and arrows, but no knives. Old iron was every thing with them, taking that in preference to bread, meat, &c. Their food was fish and shell fish. They went off early in the afternoon, probably being on a visit to this place.

"Upon the whole I was very much pleased with Good Success; the woods reminded me much of Brazil, the dead trees being covered with beautiful mosses, ferns and small flowering plants, and gave me a very different opinion of Terra del Fuego from what I had been led to expect from books.

"We left Good Success on the 23d January, and anchored on the 24th off New Island. The appearance of the country all around us was mountainous and bleak, with occasional white patches of snow, which is probably the reason why this part of the world is considered to be nothing but a barren rocky place, destitute of vegetation; but it is quite the contrary. Upon landing at New Island we found it covered with trees and shrubs, and several flowers, lots of berries, such as brush cranberries, a beautiful shrub, black currants, and two or three species of strawberry, with a most delicious berry, in flavor between a raspberry and strawberry. Here we found signs of inhabitants, but none were seen. A great many ducks were killed, and a pair of geese; the female a beautiful snow-white bird, was shot first, and the male would not quit her, but suffer'd himself to be killed also. Civilian man carries—I was going to sermonize, but it went do.

"On the 27th we anchored off Hermites island, where the vegetation is similar to the other places visited; the scurvy grass abounds all along the shore, and appears to be placed here for the benefit of poor Jack, who by the way, does not like it very well—probably for its name.

"On the 29th we sailed again in search of Orange Bay, the charts of this part of the world not being very correct, and anchored in a beautiful harbor, where we were visited by a family, in a canoe, consisting of two men, a woman with a baby, and a grown up boy. They were all stark naked, except the old man who had a small piece of seal skin on his back, and the woman who had a skin to wrap herself and child up in; they carried a fire in the bottom of the canoe, the woman paddling and doing all the labor. The men came on board and were clothed; and a nice blanket was given to the woman, who instantly wrapped the baby up in it. It was raining, and rather cold; the child was really pretty, and after it had been wrapped up and got warm, popped its head out and looked up at towards us smiling; the men would not allow the woman to get out of the canoe, and wanted every thing for themselves. The captain took down some preserves for the child, but the woman began to cry, and tried to push the canoe from alongside; after some persuasion, she tasted the preserves herself, and immediately devoured the whole, paper and all, of which it was wrapped. The people were terribly frightened at a looking-glass, pushing it away from their faces covering their faces with their hands. Indeed it was pitious to see the horror or alarm they showed, as if it was something supernatural.

"The next morning we went on shore and found the hut of our Indian friends; the women and children had run away, and no doubt were hid in the woods, as dogs were barking at a short distance. The hut was in the form of a cone, made of sticks and covered with green weeds; in it we found fish, hanging up in the smoke, plenty of shell-fish laid upon large green leaves; the blanket, &c. we had given them spread upon grass. The men offered us fish, and when I began to collect plants, they laughed and picked up grass, and every thing that was at hand, and poured them upon me with a great deal of humor, supposing probably that I was going to eat the herbs. We saw some whales in this harbor and found bones in some of the old abandoned huts. Their canoes were made of bark, sewed together with a species of seal-skin, and always have a fire in the bottom which is covered with clay.

"In the afternoon we got under way, and arrived at Orange Bay early in the evening, having been obliged to seek it out by taking observations every day, and this day found we were ten or twelve miles south of it. Orange Bay is a very good harbor, large and commodious; plenty of wood and water, with abundance of ducks, geese, fish, &c. After the ship was securely moored a light house was established on Burnett island, to guide the rest of the squadron. It set in to rain, and continued with violent winds for eight days, so as not to allow any one to go on shore, except once, to carry provisions for the party in charge of the light-house.

"The two schooners arrived on the 16th February, and the Vincennes, Peacock and Porpoise, on the 18th and 19th, from Rio Negro. Captain Wilkes ordered our ship to prepare for sea immediately, take all the scientific corps on board, and make a survey of Useless harbor; examine Port Famine, &c. entering the straits of Magellan through Cockburn channel, and return again to Orange harbor. The two schooners, the Peacock and Porpoise, with captain W. going south, in search of the magnetic pole; the Vincennes to remain at Orange Bay. They all sailed on the 25th Feb. and we on the 26th, and had a succession of storms, with violent wind and rain, making very little progress towards our destination. We saw great numbers of albatross, not go round Cape Horn yet, and although we did weather for which that part of the ocean is celebrated. Our ship rolled and pitched as it was almost impossible to sit at the table; some days every plate on it would be broken, soup and meat thrown into our laps. At night we had to tie ourselves down in bed.

"On the 4th of March we were farther from Cockburn channel than when we left Orange harbor on the 26th of February. On the 13th March we were on a lee shore, in great danger, and a fire broke out in the apothecary's department! No damage was done. The sun very seldom shone, and it rained nearly all the time.

"On the 18th we had a very disagreeable day—real Cape Horn weather—rain and sleet. We came in sight of land, wind blowing very hard, and breakers all around us. The Tower-rocks on one side of us looked really terrific, the sea breaking entirely over the smallest, completely covering it with a white envelope, the spray flying off and looking like a thick snow storm. At night we were in a very dangerous position, but, however, reached Cape Noir island, lat. 54 deg. 15 min. lon. 74 deg. 20 min. and with three anchors down hoped to hold on.

"On the morning of the 19th the wind blew harder yet, with occasional showers of snow and hail. Noir island looked as if some vegetation might be growing on it, but there was no prospect of landing; the shore was lined with breakers, and the spray in flying off made a beautiful appearance, looking like smoke. In the evening, the wind increasing, another anchor was let go, making four anchors out, and 400 fathoms of chain cable, the four anchors weighing 11,700 lbs. The 20th was a dreary day, sleet and rain. In the night we parted two of our cables, and lost a bower and sheet anchor. The same dragged a considerable distance, and we felt somewhat alarmed; but day dawned and found us safe. Towards night a particular occurred during the next day. Towards night the wind blew up afresh, and it was feared another cable was gone. Preparations were immediately made to get under way, and at 9 o'clock we lay rolling and tossing, ignorant of what would take place.

"Towards 12 o'clock the ship began to drag, almost right on to the breakers; indeed nothing but borrible rocks, the water dashing and hissing over them, were to be seen in every direction; the water began to break over us also, and the wardroom, steerage and berth deck were ankle deep. At last an order was given to slip the cables. A dead silence ensued for a few moments; then the sound of the axe cutting the stoppers, and a horrible clatter, a grumbling and grating sound as the chains flew through the bawse holes, and all was hushed. The poor ship seemed to be aware that she was to be released without an anchor, as she quivered and groaned, as the cables flew out, "like a thing of life." In a short time there were clear of the breakers, and all was quiet; the ship went easy, and the men recovered their cheerfulness. We lost all our anchors, and had to give up Useless bay! Port Famine!! Breakneck passage!! The Milky way! &c. and proceeded to Valparaiso to procure ground tackle. It is admitted by all hands, that we might go to sea twenty years and not be in such a dangerous situation again. Since then we had pleasant weather, growing warmer every day.

"April 14.—We have now been three days off Valparaiso, and have succeeded in getting anchors, and will probably get in to-night or to-morrow morning.—We sent a boat in, but found no American men of war here. Two boats immediately came off from the British sloop of war Fly, with an anchor and offer of services, which was very kind and polite. Our captain declined the offer until he heard from the shore. Our boat returned to-day, having procured every thing necessary, principally from the English stores."

THE OPIUM TRADE.

The Chinese government seems determined to persevere in its resolution to put a stop to the opium trade. An imperial commissioner, Lin, has lately been sent to Canton with full powers to act in this matter. He evinces a good deal of energy, and has already ordered several of the chief foreign opium dealers to leave the country. The following is his proclamation issued to foreigners on his arrival at Canton. It is a curious document, and quite as much to the point as the greater part of our American gubernatorial messages.

PROCLAMATION TO FOREIGNERS.

From the imperial commissioner, H. E. Lin. Lin, a high officer of the Chinese empire, now specially appointed an imperial envoy, a president of the board of war, and viceroys of Hoo Kwang, hereby proclaims to the foreigners of every nation, that they may thoroughly know and understand.

Whereas ye, the said foreigners, coming to Canton to trade, have usually reaped immense profits: therefore it is that your ships which in former years amounted annually to no more than several arrive here every year. Your import goods, no matter what they be, with us find a consumption; and respecting the cargo which you may wish to purchase in return, there is nothing in which you may not adventure. I would like to ask you if in the wide earth under heaven you can find such another profit-yielding market as this? Our great Chinese emperor views all mankind with equal benevolence, and therefore it is that he has thus graciously permitted you to trade, and become, as it were, steeped to the lips in gain. If this port of Canton, however, were to be shut against you, how could you scheme to reap profit more? Moreover, our tea and rhubarb are articles which ye foreigners from afar cannot preserve your lives without; yet year by year we allow you to export both beyond seas, without the slightest feeling of grudge on our part: never was imperial goodness greater than this?

Now if ye foreigners had a proper sense of gratitude for this extraordinary goodness, ye would hold the laws in dread; and while ye sought to profit yourselves, ye would abstain from injuring other men. But how happens it to the contrary, that ye take your unneatible opium and bring it to our central land, choosing people out of their substance and involving their very lives in destruction? I find that by means of this noxious article, ye have been fraudulently imposing upon the Chinese people now upwards of several ten years, during which time the unjust wealth ye have reaped exceeds all calculation: this is a circumstance sufficient to arouse the general indignation of mankind, and which the laws of heaven can with difficulty scarce pardon.

Formerly the prohibitions of our empire might still be considered indulgent, and therefore it was that from all our ports the sycee leaked out as the opium rushed in: now, however, the great emperor, on hearing of it, actually quivers with indignation, and therefore he will stay his hand the evil must be completely done, and swiftly done away with.

Respecting our own subjects, he who opens an opium shop, or who sells opium, he who opens a shop to death; and it is also in agitation whether or not to the mere smoker may not be accorded the extreme penalty of the law; and ye foreigners who come to our central land to reside, ought in reason to submit to our statutes, as do the natives of China themselves.

Now I, the said imperial envoy, reside in Fokien, on the borders of the sea, and thoroughly understand all the arts and ingenious devices of ye foreigners in all their bearings; so it is that I have to thank the great emperor for thus specially appointing me as an officer who has frequently distinguished himself by meritorious actions, to be a special commissioner for reducing to order these distasteful districts, and for taking measures with irresponsible authority to prevent the further influx of opium. Were I to go back and sit in judgment on your reiterated crimes, as relates to the selling of opium,—then indeed to spare you would be impossible; but, remembering that ye are foreigners from afar, and that hitherto ye may not have known that our laws are so severe, I now clearly expound the statute to you, not bearing to slay you without previous instructive warning.

I find that ye have now anchored at Lintin and other places, many store-ships, in which are several tens of thousand chests of opium. Your intention is to dispose of them clandestinely, but ye remember not how strict we are in making centuries at this point, how, then, will ye find people who will convey it for you any more? And seizures being made with equal severity throughout every province in the empire, what other place have ye where ye dare to sell it off? This time opium is indeed prohibited and cannot circulate; every man knows that is a deadly poison; why then should ye heap it up in your foreign store-ships, and keep them there long anchored on the great sea; not only thereby wasting much money by their heavy expenses, but exposing them to the chance of storms, of fire, and other accidents which no man can foresee?

I, therefore, unting all these circumstances, now issue this my edict, and when it reaches the said foreigners, let them immediately and with due respect in conformity thereto, take all the opium in these said store-ships, and deliver it up to the officers of government; and allow the hong merchants to examine clearly, which man by name gives up so many chests, the total weight, so many catties, and taels; and let (the hong merchants) make out a distinct list to that effect, and hand it up to the officers to be checked; that these officers may openly take possession of the whole, and have it burned and destroyed, so as to cut off its power of doing mischief; a single atom must not be hidden or concealed; and at one and the same time let a duly prepared bond be drawn up, written in the Chinese and foreign character, stating clearly that the ships afterwards to arrive here shall never to all eternity dare to bring any opium; should any ship after this bring it, then her whole cargo on board is to be confiscated and her people put to death; and that they will willingly undergo it as the penalty of their crime; all this to be stated clearly in the said bond.

I have heard it said, that in the ordinary transactions of life, ye the said foreigner, attach a great deal of importance to the words "my faith"; if, then, you will readily do as I am commanding you, i. e. take that opium which has already come, and deliver every atom of it up to the officers of government, and in relation to that opium not yet arrived, prevent it from ever coming here, and this will show that you really can feel contrition for your crime, and fear the laws of the land; this, then, may spare your previous iniquities being raked up and brought against you. I, the imperial commissioner, will then forthwith consult with the governor and fooyuen that we may conjointly memorialise the great emperor, that he may grant you extraordinary indulgence, and that he not only forgive you your previous sins, but that he may also testify upon you some proof of his favor so as to bestow his approbation of your contrition and repentance; and after this your trade may go on the same as ever. Thus not losing by being good foreigners, and by means of an honorable and more respectable than any other can any thing be more respectable than this? But if, on the other hand, you obstinately adhere to your folly, and will not awake, if you think to borrow excuses to carry on your smuggling, or if you use the name of some sailor or other to bring it, and say that it does not concern you, or if you craftily say that you are going to take it to another country, or throw it into the sea, or if you wish to seize an opportunity for going to another province to sell it; or if you hope to stifle enquiry by giving up to the mandarins one or two chests out of ten, then all such procedures show that you have in your hearts a desire to oppose the laws, and to remain firmly wedded to your wickedness, without prospect of change; then I say, that although it is the maxim of our Chinese empire to treat with great kindness and tenderness the men from afar, yet can we not suffer them to treat us with scorn and contempt; but shall immediately in conformity with the new statute, punish them with the utmost severity, as we do our own subjects.

Upon this occasion I, the imperial commissioner, being at Peking, in my own person received the emperor's commands—the law when once uttered must be put in force! moreover, having brought with me these orders and this great irresponsible authority for prevention, they must be executed to the benefit of public business, and may not be compared with that careless examination and mode of acting that belong to ordinary matters. If the stream of opium cannot be cut off, I cannot return from this. I am sworn to have the same beginning and end (anglic to stand or fall) by the opium question. There is no such things as suspending my labors in the middle. Moreover, I find that the indignation of the people of the inner land is almost to a man roused against you; and if ye foreigners will not reform and repent, if profit continues to be your sole object, then it is not only with the majesty of our troops and the abundance of our forces by land and water that we may sweep you off, but we have merely to call upon the common people of the land to rise, and these would be more than sufficient utterly to annihilate you. Further, we should, as a temporary expedient, close the ships holds and as a final one shut up the port; and what difficulty would there be in cutting off your commerce forever? Our Chinese empire covers many tens of thousands of miles in extent, every sort of produce is there heaped up and running over, we have no occasion to borrow any thing from you foreigners; but I fear that were we to stop the intercourse, the plans for doing business (and obtaining profit) of every one of our countries would at that moment come to an end! Ye foreign traders, who have come from distant countries, how is it that you have not yet found out the difference between the pains of toil and the sweets of ease? the great distance betwixt the power of the few and the power of the many?

In reference to those vagabond foreigners who reside in the foreign hongs and are in the habit of selling opium, I already know their names full well, and therefore need not do any thing to name them. I am no less acquainted with them also. Those who can point out the vagabond foreigners and compel them to deliver up their opium, those who first step forward and give the bond before spoken of, these are the good foreigners, and I, the imperial envoy, will speedily bestow upon them some distinguishing mark of my approbation. Woe and happiness, disgrace or honor, are in your hands!—It is ye yourselves who select for yourselves.

I have now ordered the hong merchants to go to your factories, and explain the matter to you; and I have limited 3 days within which they must let me have a reply, and at the same time produce the duly-prepared bond afore-mentioned.

Wait till I have consulted the viceroy and fooyuen, when we shall clearly proclaim the time within which the opium must be delivered up.

Do not only delay the idle delay and expectation, who will only lead to the vain repentance! A special edict.—Tientsin, 19th year, 2nd moon, 4th day.—18th March, 1839.

The following letter from Macao, announces that the trade has been stopped:—

Macao, March 25, 1839.

Matters appear to be fast hastening to a crisis in this port with regard to the opium trade, and I hope the result will be the opening of the empire. The commissioner now in Canton has taken hold of the business as none of his predecessors have ever done, and the Chinese government has shown a good deal of strength. On the 22d the trade was stopped, and no foreigners allowed to leave Canton, and the next day the officer and a posse of soldiers entered the factory of Dent & Co. demanding Mr. Dent for his contumacy in not leaving the country at the orders of the emperor.

Mr. Dent not being present, Mr. Inglis went into the city with the officer, accompanied by Thom and Morrison as interpreters. Elliott sent an agent on a mission on the 23d to Macao, stating that he had ordered the English part of the opium fleet back to Hongkong, in company with the Sarné sloop of war, and there to put themselves in a state of defence. He left Macao for Canton the same evening, in order to demand passports for all British subjects to leave Canton, but we have not yet heard the result. Most of the Lintin fleet have been in Macao roads for the last few days, and to-day the opium in Macao is all being re-embarked on board ship as the commissioner has threatened to search all the houses in Macao for it.

The Port government has received orders to fit up a house for the commissioner, and they are making ready the tavern on the Praya Grande, near the landing place, for his reception. There are 29 war junks anchored in the roads. The people in Macao are in great trouble, for if the opium trade is cut off from the place, they have a sad prospect before them. But in the eradication of an evil of this magnitude of this trade, we must expect much distress; if the effect is healing of the empire in a measure of a deadly evil, the distress bears a small proportion to the good. It is estimated that there are a thousand chests in the place, and property amounting to 20 millions on board ship, all of which it is expected will go to Singapore.

THE CULTIVATION OF OPIUM.

In India the extent of territory occupied with the poppy, and the amount of population and capital engaged in its cultivation and in the preparation of opium, are far greater than in any other part of the world. Malwa, Benares and Behar (Patna) are the chief localities; and nearly every chest of the drug exported from India bears one of their names, according to the part of the country in which it was produced. About one-half of the whole product of India is obtained from Malwa. Though the chiefs of Malwa are under British protection, the management of the soil is entirely beyond the company's authority, and both the cultivation of the poppy and the production of opium are free. The traffic in the drug is also free, excepting "transit duties" which are levied upon it when passing through the British territories, as most of it does on its way to Bombay, from whence it is exported to China. But in Benares, Behar and throughout all the territories within the company's jurisdiction, the cultivation of the poppy, the preparation of the drug and the traffic in it, until it is brought to Calcutta, and sold by auction for exportation, are under a strict monopoly. Should an individual undertake the cultivation, without having "entered into engagements with the government to deliver the produce at the fixed rate," his property would be immediately attached, and the ryot* compelled either to destroy his poppies, or give securities for the faithful delivery of the product. Nay, according to a late writer, "the growing of opium is common in every part of the first division of the empire made by government, through its native servants, and if a ryot refuses the advance," "the simple plan of throwing the rupees into his house is adopted; should he attempt to abscond, the peons seize him, tie the advance up in his clothes and push him into his house. The business being now settled, and there being no remedy, he applies himself, as he may, to the fulfilment of his contract."

Vast tracts of land, formerly occupied with other articles, are now covered with poppies, which require a very superior soil in order to produce opium in perfection. Hence, its cultivation has not extended over waste and barren lands, but into those districts and villages best fitted for agricultural purposes, where other plants, "grown from time immemorial," have been driven out before it. But though poppies are now spread over a wide extent of territory, the cultivation is still, as it has long been, rapidly on the increase. In 1821, in the single district of Sarun, belonging to the province of Behar, there were, according to the testimony of Mr. Kennedy, (many years collector of the land revenue and deputy opium agent in that district), between 15,000 and 20,000 bags of land (about one-third of an acre per bag), then under cultivation. In 1829, the amount was nearly or quite doubled, and the produce, in the meantime, had increased in a still greater degree.

The mode of cultivation pursued in the "Patna district" may afford a good idea of that which obtains in other places. The ryot having selected a piece of ground, always preferring (caeteris paribus) that which is nearest his house, encloses it with a fence. He then, by repeated ploughings, makes it completely fine, and removes all the weeds and grass. Next he divides the field into two or more divisions, by small dikes of mould running lengthways and crossways, according to the slope and nature of the ground. He afterwards divides the field into smaller squares by other dikes leading from the principal ones. A pit or sort of well, its dug about ten feet deep at one end of the field, from which, by a leather bucket, water is raised into one of the principal dikes, and in this way it is carried in every part of the field, as required. This irrigation is necessary, because the cultivation is carried on in the dry weather. The seed is sown in November, and the juice is collected in February and March, during a period usually of about six weeks. Throughout the whole process the ryot is assisted by his family and servants, both women and children. As soon as the plants spring up, the weeding and watering commence, and are continued till the poppies come to maturity. Perpendicular cuts or scratches are then made in the rind of the bulbous heads, with a muscel-shell, found in all the tanks of the country. From these cuts the juice exudes, and is daily collected and delivered to the local officers. This is a very tedious process, requiring constant attention. When the poppies are exhausted, their color changes from green to white. The seeds contain no opium, and the labors of the season are now closed. The cultivator receives about three and a half rupees (Sp. Dis. 1.65) for every chest of the poppy just reared, which is required to be of a specific consistency. This must be such that a gomastah can take it out of the vessel in which it is brought for delivery by the ryot, and turn it over without its dropping off his hand; if it is not sufficiently dry to admit of this, it is either returned to the ryot for further evaporation, or an additional quantity must be delivered to make up the deficiency.

The lands under cultivation are measured every year, and their boundaries fixed, in order to prevent collision among those to whom they are assigned. The government annually enters into an engagement with the cultivators, through an intermediate agency, constructed in the following manner: There is first a collector, who is a European; 2dly, there are gomastahs, a superior class of men, both in education and caste; 3dly, sudder mattus, a respectable class of landholders; 4thly, villagers mattus, the principal villagers, a little superior to the ryots; and 5thly, the ryots, the chief laborers, in the cultivation of poppies. The "engagement" entered into with the government is this: when the poppy is ripe, and immediately before the period of extracting the juice, the gomastah and his establishment make a circuit of the country, and form "by guess" a probable estimate of the produce of each field. He then makes the ryot enter into an engagement with him to deliver the quantity thus estimated, and as much more as the field will yield, at the price previously fixed; if he fails to deliver the estimated quantity, and the collector has reason to suppose he has embezzled the deficiency, he is empowered by law to prosecute the ryot in the civil court for damages.

*The ryot is the immediate cultivator of the soil.
 *The seer = 1 lb. 13, 13.866 dr. avoirdupois.

The product in India, for the last year, it is said, amounts to about 35,000 chests. The Malwa averages about 134 lbs. per chest; the other 116 lbs. The weight of a chest, however, varies, and is sometimes 140 lbs. In Turkey, the product may be 2,000 or more chests, annually. The estimates regard to China, we have only the estimation of the council for Choo Tann, respecting his native province Yunnan. The poppy, he says, is cultivated all over the hills and open chaupaigna, and the quantity of opium annually produced there cannot be less than several thousand chests.

From the foregoing statements, derived chiefly from official documents, the reader will be able to form some opinion as to the extent of territory and the amount of population and capital now devoted to the production of opium. Taking into account the whole of Turkey, China and India, it will be seen that many thousand acres, with millions of the inhabitants, are employed in the cultivation of poppies. Inquiries of the opium trade.

THE SOLDIERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

Remarks of Mr. J. L. Tillinghast, at the table with the soldiers of '76, at Providence, R. I. on the 4th of July last.

Mr. Tillinghast, being called upon by the president, said that in the presence of these venerable relics of our heroic age, it was difficult to comprise within the limits of a toast any satisfactory portion of the thoughts that crowd the mind, or of the feelings that fill the heart. These hoary heads are indeed crowns of glory; and this day of triumph—which we are celebrating with so many marks of just and reverent gladness in our temples and at our festivals—is peculiarly and emphatically their day; for they, with their compatriots, made it what it is. Annually they come up to our altars, and partake in the solemnities with which a succeeding generation commemorates the transactions by which they marked their own as an era in time, and a perpetual theme for grateful and exalted contemplation.

We greet them with reverence and joy. We owe them such words of acknowledgment as may assist their aged spirits to realize the certainty of their fame. But we feel that there is one reflection which casts a melancholy shade over the otherwise unalloyed enjoyment of such a scene; it is, that they annually come up with diminished numbers, and exhibit those sad vacancies in their line which their can no substitutes to fill. When I heard the sentiment which was just now expressed at this board, that as their ranks were thinned by time we should be more ready and proud to do them honor, I was struck with its fitness. Few have they become, and still fewer will they soon be, upon whom we can look as the representatives of their brotherhood; their individual value rises in proportion to the diminution of their number; and, in this respect, let them be to us as the sacred books of the Sibyl of Cumæ. Of those, you know, Sir, the tradition is, that an ancient woman brought to Tarquin, king of Rome, a number of volumes inscribed with sacred characters, mysteriously charged with the fate and future fortunes of the Roman people, demanding for them a price which she seemed extravagant and would not pay. She retired, and, after consigning three of the volumes to the flames, returned, demanding the same price for those which remained; which was again refused. She repeated this work of partial destruction, and her still unsuccessful demand, until the number was reduced to three, when the king, alarmed by the idea that he was losing a treasure which he had not known how to appreciate, gladly purchased the remaining three at the original price of the whole. Sir, the army of the revolution was composed of characters charged with the fate and fortunes of the American people—and of more than the American people. The few who are spared to this day are venerable and sacred remains. We behold now less than thirty, and there will soon be less than three. But we will value the survivors, and I trust we do value them, as the last, the unchangeable representatives of the value of the original whole.

I believe it would rejoice the hearts of all here to witness in our day the erection of some national monument which would carry to aftertimes an imperishable record of the men to whom we owe our independence, and of the estimation in which we hold them and their achievement. Our whole country is, perhaps, not sufficiently sensible of the real value of such permanent memorials, when reared by a common effort, and commemorative of characters and events that constitute a common glory. In a suitable structure of this sort, the citizens of an extended country would feel that they had one more pledge of union, and a perpetual incentive of public virtue. It argued knowledge of our nature in the ancients, to represent in sculpture, upon triumphal columns, the great transactions they wished to commemorate, and the forms and features of those who were engaged in them. I am not suggesting such a monument as a splendid fancy has conceived, and a most rich and powerful eloquence has described, upon the base of which, sinking to Tartarus, the oppressors might read their infamy; I would not desire that the base of such a monument should rest in a region of guilt and penance; nor, were it possible, would it be necessary that its capital should ascend to heaven to show the sainted patriots that they have triumphed; for there, we must believe, they know it. But, when the means of this nation are commensurate with the wish, I would gladly see a monument on which, at least, the name of every man who gave his person to his country, in her great day of trial, should be inscribed in marble. And I should be proud to point out, on a conspicuous part of such a monument, the very large proportionate space which was occupied by the names of the men of Rhode Island.

Amongst ourselves, upon this day of remembrance, man without man glory, but with pride sanctioned by the strictest justice, remind each other of the titles of Rhode Island to a bright and broad page in the annals of those times. And at this our annual meeting with these white-headed veterans of Rhode Island line, I should deem it a point of duty towards them for some one at this table to revive in their recollections the particulars of many scenes and events in which they and their departed comrades acquired honor for themselves and for their state, had not that duty been so faithfully and so beautifully performed in the public exercises to which they have this day already listened. For they must be left in doubt whether aftertimes will, on all fit occasions, remember that, from the lighting of that first beacon fire—that blazing harbinger of the revolution—which was kindled upon the waters of the Narragansett, to the crowning act which brought the great drama of Rhode Island to the capture of the last remaining hostile army, the spirit of Rhode Island was signaling itself by acts of hardihood and splendor, as well as by sufferings and toil, in every region, on every element, and at every period of the war. The first blood drawn from the veins of a British officer in that great quarrel was drawn by a shot from a Rhode Island musket, upon our own waves, within sight from the tower of that temple where we have this morning heard the scenes and principles of the revolution so eloquently reviewed by the orator of the day. The owner of that musket still lives in honor amongst us, still characterized by the native resolution which the lapse of sixty seven years from that time has not been able to extinguish or abate. The first sword that waved in triumph upon the surmounted rampart at Yorktown was a Rhode Island sword. The owner of that sword as he clambered up the work, received upon his hands and arms the stabs of the bayonet that were aimed at his life, and having gained the summit, and planted it himself firmly there, he lifted his sword high in his bleeding hand, and called aloud to friends and foes, "capt. Stephen Olney's company forms here."

To these specimens, marking the commencement and close of the great contest, Rhode Island can point amongst her sons. They are specimens of men of the revolution—a race of men who by their patient and more difficult courage which manfully encounters suffering and privation, and disappointment, and disaster, and endures to the end, as well as by valor in the field, and sagacity in council, have fairly won for themselves the place they hold in the estimation of mankind.

*The owner was not the person who fired it. It was taken up suddenly, and discharged by another of the party in the boat with him.

But it was my intention, in the sentiment which I shall offer, to turn the thoughts of this company to another class of heroic minds—another race of devoted patriots—in whose contributions and generous sacrifices, in whose sufferings and tears, the foundations of our independence were also laid. If in that time of trial man did all his part, woman, also, did all hers. With a spirit as high, and with an inward fire as holy and as strong as ever lighted man or woman to the sternest or most exalted duty, the American matron and daughter, sister and wife, went to the unwonted tasks, and placed themselves in the path of the deeper afflictions that arose and multiplied with the events of the conflict. The mansion and the cottage, the garden and the field, were every where mute witnesses of their energy and their endurance. Let it not be thought that while man was called to more conspicuous action, and to more public sacrifices and griefs, the task of woman was comparatively easy or her burden light. Not so, not so; her cup of bitterness, as well as her measure of duty, was full and overflowing. Did not the virgin suffer when, generous and sacrificing, she devoted her chastity to a proud sense of public duty, she postponed the holy contract to which her faith and her affections were pledged until she could receive in a husband a faithful soldier who had performed his whole tour of service for her? Did not the wife suffer when with her own hands she armed the father of her children and sent him forth to his battles—calling up in her bosom the same spirit which prompted the spartan matron to say to her son, as she gave him his shield, "return bearing this, or borne upon it?" Did she not suffer when encountering in solitude the privations of her once cheerful home, she turned her hands not only to womanly, but to manly toil, to provide support for her offspring, or comforts for her absent and suffering lord? Did she not suffer when she went forth to the field and laid her ear to the ground to listen to the sounds of distant battle, feeling that every sound which came faintly upon the breeze, or found more dire conveyance through the vibrations of the solid soil, might be the voice of the fate of a son or a father, a brother or a husband? Did she not suffer when she saw the partner of her affections toil-worn and spent in war, with poverty for his present portion; and poverty for his probable future destiny? Did she not suffer when, in many an instance, she saw him descend to the grave, honored but still unrequited by the country he contributed to save? And has she not suffered in the long, sad widowhood which such events have provided for her, and which in many still remaining instances is the only provision she owes to her country? Sir, the females who were connected with the trials of the revolution were a noble army of martyrs. And when I hear the cold and miserly objections which are urged against a provision for all those who survive as bereaved relics of departed soldiers, I cannot but feel that such objections are unworthy of the land which has so largely profited by their sacrifices and sufferings.

I will propose a sentiment to which I know these aged men about me will readily respond: for it is our nature, as well as our language, which cries and expresses, by the same word, valor in the field with devotion to the fair—and that galantry for which they have ever been distinguished still belongs to them in both senses of the word.

The widow of the soldiers of the revolution—Let her find in the grateful pity of her country some recompense for her sacrifices, and a solace for her domestic desolation.

THE BALL AT CAMP WASHINGTON.

On Thursday night a military ball was given by the officers stationed at Camp Washington. As it was understood that very extensive preparations were in progress for the celebration, and as a subject of much conversation, and for the satisfaction of those who did not attend, we offer a few hasty words of description.

The ground, which was very suitable for the purpose, was rendered strikingly romantic, as it exhibited from the Trenton road, numberless lights among the tents and trees. As the company assembled, rockets were constantly sent up in beautiful variety. The arrangements for dancing, and the accommodation of the guests, were planned with tasteful ingenuity, and executed with admirable skill. Several large tents extending over a smooth temporary flooring, presented an ample space for exercise.

Around and along the middle of the room numerous handsome lamps were suspended decorated with leaves and flowers. At intervals devices of arms and musical instruments, draped with the colors of the regiments and national flags, were hung against the trees and supports within the enclosure. The sides too were festooned with the stripes and stars, and wreaths of laurel and other grateful foliage completed the classic decorations of the ample canvass.

Owing to the unfavorable appearance of the sky through the day, the guests were less numerous than had been expected. About fifteen hundred invitations had been sent to various parts of the country, but those who had the pleasure of attending did not exceed a few hundred.

Amends however were made, in the great comfort which an excessive crowd would have diminished. By five o'clock the ladies had all arrived, and when the dancing commenced, to the playing of an excellent band, the scene was highly picturesque and most agreeably exciting. It seemed as if the gallant managers had selected the fairest of their country women to grace the tented field. As we surveyed the numerous and lovely groups, we had full faith in the saying, that "the American women are the most beautiful in the world." Their dresses too in the present tasteful fashion, and the rich uniforms of the officers, enhanced the attractive variety of the spectacle.

Before twelve o'clock supper was announced, and the company passed to another area, erected and ornamented similarly to that appropriated for dancing. There, two very long tables, united by a third at the top, were covered with a splendid and luxurious display of fruits and confectionary. Every thing was profuse and excellent, and was arranged by Mr. Parkinson in a style most creditable to his ideas of such artificial beauty. Flowing glasses and bright eyes sparkled around the sumptuous board, and young hearts beat lightly to gay melodies. As the night waned and quadrilles were resumed, a few retired, but morning almost stood tip-toe upon the misty mountain top, before the sentry was left alone upon his watch.

The large company which thus enjoyed the liberal and elegant hospitality of the officers of Camp Washington, will long bear it in pleasing and grateful recollection. [National Gazette.]

IMPORTANT LAW CASE.

THE WHALE SHIPS.

From the New York Journal of Commerce.

United States circuit court—Aug. 3d. Judge Betts presiding.

The United States vs. Charles Jenkins and others. The defendants were indicted for an endeavor to make a revolt on board the whaling ship Georgia, of New London, capt. J. P. Hall. She was regularly registered as an American vessel, but not licensed, and was on a fishing voyage in the south Atlantic ocean, when the offence occurred.

Evidence was adduced on the part of the prosecution which proved that the prisoners had refused to obey the captain's orders, and acted in such a way as to clearly come under the legal definition of attempting to make a revolt.

Counsel for the prisoners raised two objections, first, that the United States district attorney must prove the American character of the vessel, by the production of the custom house papers. Secondly, that a registered vessel was not authorized to engage in the fisheries, and therefore the defendants could not be charged with any offence committed on board her.

The district attorney contended that, according to the law of 1835, it was only necessary to show that the vessel was de facto an American vessel, owned by American citizens, claiming to be, and in fact being an American vessel. And that although deprived of the privileges of American vessels, according to our revenue laws, she must still be considered an American vessel according to the law of 1835, whether she was de jure or not an American vessel. Secondly, that a register was sufficient for this purpose, and that it was not necessary, by the act of 1793, to take out a licence unless for the purpose of obtaining certain privileges and immunities, but that her not having done so, did not render her the less an American vessel, de facto if not de jure.

The jury charged the jury. The defendants here put in only a general plea of not guilty, but they have also a right to avail themselves of any thing which suffices to show they are not guilty. It is therefore not sufficient to merely prove their innocence criminal, in the abstract, but it must also be made criminal by law.

The defendants now take the ground, that the duty, an alleged breach of which they are being tried for, was not obligatory on them, and that therefore this court has no jurisdiction over them, and cannot take cognizance of their conduct, while they were on board that vessel.

If this court were to act solely on its own impression it could entertain no doubt or hesitation in relation to the question.—Because ever since 1789, and 1793, prosecutions of this sort have frequently before this court, and it has always exercised jurisdiction over them, and the prisoners, if convicted, have been invariably punished. The court would therefore feel itself fully warranted in adhering to that interpretation of the law, which it had heretofore given, if it had not been suspended by an expose of a high character.

It appears that within the last two months, a question has been raised in Rhode Island, whether men on board a whale ship, circumstances of the one now in question, are amenable to the laws of the United States for certain breaches of discipline. And that court decided that they are not. This court, however, entertains a different opinion; but, in deference to the respected authority which has judged otherwise, we shall not now pass upon the question without further consideration, but put it in a shape in which it can be finally determined. And if it appears that this court has been so long in error, we shall of course alter our view of the law, but if we consider ourselves right, we shall continue to entertain the same opinion, until it is corrected, not by a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, but by the supreme court of the United States. This is the supreme court and this court, possess but the same authority, and neither of them have power to lay down rules for the guidance of the other, except an advisory. We, however, look to the court of Rhode Island with great respect, and if that court had been the first to lay down the rule in relation to this question, we would readily conclude to decide as that court has decided, until the court at Washington determined the matter. But this court has for nearly forty years decided differently, and it now becomes a question whether this court have laid down the rule correctly, or that the more recent decision shall be adopted as the right one.

The question then arises thus. The law says, that if American seamen commit certain acts, they are subject to be prosecuted, and other laws require certain preliminary conditions to be complied with, before vessels can possess certain privileges and advantages. And if the rule laid down by the court of Rhode Island is correct, it may go no further than this, that all vessels sailing with a register, must pay duties on their oils and skins, like foreign vessels, and be liable to the inconveniences and disadvantages of foreign vessels, and yet the seamen on board them be subject and amenable to the laws of the United States.

This court will now lay down its view of the law in such a broad and comprehensive way as will suffice to have the question finally determined.

I lay it down as a rule of law, that persons are subject to criminal prosecutions for offences committed on board American vessels, on the high seas, or in foreign ports, and that the ownership of the vessel determines her international character, within the interpretation of these laws. And that the ownership may be proved in the same manner as that of any other chattel, and that it is not necessary for the public prosecutor to produce any documentary evidences. Such has been the uniform course of decision in this circuit for years past, and the principle seems to be distinctly recognised (5 Wheat, 199). It is therefore sufficient to prove by parole evidence that the vessel was owned by American citizens.

Whatever effect the want of a license, and proceeding on a fishing voyage under a register, may have as to the privileges and advantages of the ship under our revenue laws, her being documented with the one or the other improperly, does not denationalize the vessel. She may be subject to duties and disabilities at the custom house, as if not documented at all, or as if she was a foreign vessel, but no act of congress takes away her intrinsic character, and say that she is under a register, and not having a license, she can be legally employed on a whaling voyage, and can come into American ports or into the waters of the United States, without subjecting themselves to the disadvantages or disabilities of foreign vessels. And that these vessels which go to the south Atlantic ocean, ought to be admitted on paying American tonnage duties, and no duty on the oil; and that the statute which requires a license refers to a different sort of trade.

The jury, bearing in mind these propositions, will now retire to consider the evidence, and determine on the guilt of the defendants. If the jury finds them guilty, the court will suspend their sentence until the case is fully argued before the judges. The jury retired for a few minutes, and brought in a verdict of guilty against all the prisoners.

For the United States, the district attorney, Mr. Butler. For the prisoners, Mr. Nash.

THE CASE OF MR. RIDGWAY.

The case of Mr. Ridgway, of Philadelphia, upon a writ of habeas corpus, sued out on the occasion of a bail being demanded of him for his appearance to answer a criminal charge, in connexion with the late bankruptcy of T. W. Dyott & Co. has, in consequence of the character and standing of the citizen thus charged, excited so much and so generally the public attention, that it is supposed our readers may be desirous to know the particulars of the imputation upon Mr. K. and of his acquittal of it. For this and other reasons, we copy the following from the Philadelphia papers.

[Reported for the Public Ledger.]

COMMONWEALTH vs. JACOB RIDGWAY.
Court of Common Pleas—before judges King, Randall and Jones. Habeas corpus.

The defendant had been bound over by the mayor to answer the charge of a "conspiracy with Dr. Dyott to defraud the community," and, refusing to give bail to the mayor, was committed to the custody of Willis H. Blaney, one of the high constables, and immediately sued out this writ of habeas corpus. The testimony on the part of the commonwealth was produced, and the case fully argued on both sides by counsel, and on Saturday, August 3d, 1839, the defendant was discharged, the judges giving their opinions seriatim, all concurring to the conclusion that the defendant could not be held over to answer.

Judge Randall, who presided on this trial, delivered his opinion as follows:

The writ of habeas corpus in this case was directed to Willis H. Blaney, one of the high constables of the city of Philadelphia, who returned that he held the relator in custody by virtue of a commitment signed by the mayor, charging him "with a conspiracy with Thomas W. Dyott to defraud the community." &c.

A preliminary exception was made by the counsel for the commonwealth to the regularity or propriety of the writ in the first instance, which, if well founded, will prevent the necessity of any further examination of the cause, and place the relator in the situation he was in at the time the writ issued.

It is said that because the defendant was not actually in prison, and he being able to give the security required, (his own recognizance only having been demanded by the mayor), his case is not within the letter of the writ of the habeas corpus act. It is admitted that in cases where the committing magistrate has no authority to take bail, a habeas corpus may issue to the constable or other officer having the defendant in charge; but a distinction is endeavored to be drawn between such a case, and one in which the magistrate may take bail and the party is able to procure it. I am unable to perceive any such distinction; on the contrary, I think the case both within the spirit and letter of the act.

The object of the habeas corpus act was to prevent any wrongful or illegal restraint of personal liberty; and whenever a person is deprived of the privilege of going when and where he pleases, he is restrained of his liberty, and has a right to inquire if that restraint be illegal and wrongful, whether it be a jailer, constable, or private individual. It is not necessary that the degradation of being incarcerated in a prison should be undergone to entitle any citizen who may consider himself unjustly charged with a breach of the laws to a hearing. The whole spirit of the law is in favor of liberty, and, if the words were doubtful, it should be construed liberally in favor of that blessing. But the case is also within the strict letter of the law. The act declares, "if any person shall be or stand committed or detained for any criminal or supposed criminal matter, unless for treason or felony," &c. he shall (in vacation) apply to a judge, who is required to award and grant a writ of habeas corpus, to be "directed to the person or persons in whose custody the prisoner is detained;" and "the officer, sheriff, jailer, keeper, or other person whatsoever to whom the same shall be directed," is required to bring the prisoner before the judge who awards the writ.—This, and some other portions of our habeas corpus act, have been copied from the British statute of '31, cap. 2, ch. 2, under which it has been expressly decided that a constable is within that provision of the act which imposes a penalty for refusing a copy of the cause cited in (1 Strangely, 126). And in one of the cases cited in another part of this examination by the counsel for the commonwealth, on a charge similar to the present, (the conspiracy), the habeas corpus was issued by the chief justice, and directed to a constable, who made the return.

This point being disposed of, it becomes necessary to consider what is the offence with which the relator is charged, and what is the evidence exhibited in its support.

At the commencement of the hearing, the counsel for the commonwealth stated five distinct and specific charges, or what, perhaps, may properly be termed counts; but, in conclusion, these were reduced to three, viz:

1. Conspiracy to establish an unlawful bank.
2. Conspiracy to support an unlawful bank, with a false capital.

3. Conspiracy to support an unlawful bank, with a false capital, knowing the representation of capital to be false.

And each of these with a view to cheat and defraud the citizens of this commonwealth.

It appears to be conceded that the English doctrine of conspiracy is to a great degree in force in Pennsylvania, and that a conspiracy to cheat may be punished here by indictment, although in at least one of our sister states it has been held that no conspiracy to commit a civil injury can be punished criminally, unless the act, if done by an individual, would be the subject of an indictment. [4 Halstead, 293.]

To make the conspiracy an indictable offence, even in England, there must be either a direct intention that injury shall result from it, or the object must be to benefit the conspirators to the prejudice of the public or the oppression of individuals. And as this is a class of cases in which direct and positive proof can seldom be obtained, resort must be had to affidavits and declarations of the parties, to prove as well the combination as the motives of the parties entering into it.

In the present case, it is not alleged there is any direct proof of criminal combination; but, for the purpose of establishing it, the commonwealth has given in evidence the testimony of the relator as given by him before the insolvent court on the application of Thomas W. Dyott for the benefit of the insolvent laws in February last, some other documentary evidence, and has examined a number of witnesses; from all of which it appears that some time prior to the 9th of May, 1836, Thomas W. Dyott established a banking institution in the city of Philadelphia by the name of the Manual Labor bank, on that day (9th May) executed a bond and warrant of attorney to Stephen Simpson, Samuel S. Sneyd, Peter A. Calder, and John A. Rowe, in the penalty of $500,000, stating that "he had already issued, and was about to issue, his certain promissory notes for various sums of money," and had "already received, and is also about to receive and hold in deposit, such sums of money as shall be left and deposited with him at his said banking house." The condition of the bond was for the faithful payment and discharge of those notes and deposits, or, in default thereof, execution to issue against his real estate. Judgment was entered on his bond in the district court for the city and county of Philadelphia on the 11th of May, 1836, and the warrant of attorney filed.

In April, 1837, a run was commenced on the bank by the note holders and depositors, which Dr. Dyott was unable to meet without assistance. He then applied to the relator (who had before that time occasionally discounted his notes or loaned him money) for aid. The relator agreed to advance money from time to time on receiving satisfactory security for its repayment, and on the 6th of April, 1837, Doct. Dyott executed his bond and warrant of attorney in favor of the relator in the penalty of $40,000, conditioned for the payment of such money as might be advanced to him; and as a further security, on the 7th of April, 1837, Dr. D. assigned to the relator an invoice of arch ware said to be in stores in Second, above Arch street, and valued by Dr. D. at $93,899 26. The run on the bank continued until the general suspension of specie payments in May, 1837. During that time the relator advanced about $30,000. His whole advance during the year 1837 being in the neighborhood of $50,000.

On the 19th of May, 1837, Messrs. Simpson, Sneyd, and others, executed an assignment of the bond for $500,000 to the relator, to hold the same "in trust for the uses and purposes" in the said bond mentioned; this assignment was entered on record on the 2d of May, 1837, and the judgment marked to the use of the relator. The existence of the bond as a security for the bank had been published in the newspapers, but without the names of the obligees or obligors. Soon after the assignment, the advertisement was altered by Dr. Dyott, inserting the name of Jacob Ridgway trustee and bond holder.

Dr. Dyott was the owner of considerable real estate which he valued at $200,000, though the relator never considered it worth one-third of that sum, and on one occasion told the doctor that it would not doing $50,000. What was in reality the value of the property does not appear. He also possessed considerable personal property, but on the 1st of July, 1837, he assigned all his stock (including the glass ware which had been assigned as collateral security to the relator) to J. B. & C. W. Dyott, his son and nephew, for the nominal sum of $150,000. When the transfer became known to the relator does not appear, further than that he stated in his testimony. On ascertaining the fact, he required, in lieu thereof, additional security for his debt, and on the 1st of February, 1838, he received the bond of T. W. Dyott and J. B. & C. W. Dyott for $45,594 88, and on the 20th of May of the same year another bond of the same parties for $13,579 67. He continued his advances until September, 1838, in various sums, amounting in all during that year (including the purchase of the mortgages of $5,000 each) to the sum of $49,460.

After the assignment of the bond to the relator, and the advertisement of his name as trustee and bond holder, many of the witnesses who have been examined called on him to ascertain the value of the notes and the security of the deposits. He always stated his belief in their security, but generally stated that belief to be founded on the representation of Dr. Dyott, but on some occasions he appeared to speak without reference to the statements of Dr. D. These statements were made in 1837; in November of that year he said to one witness who called on him that he believed the real or personal estate of the doctor was sufficient to pay his debts, and that in his opinion the notes of the Manual Labor bank were better than those of the loan or savings institutions. While conversing with this witness, some persons came in and offered to sell real estate in Southwark, and he declined the purchase. In the spring of 1838, when asked his opinion of the value of the notes, he referred to his own practice: he was then receiving the notes in payments due to himself.

In a conversation with Dr. D. in October, 1837, so the relator told him that his (Dr.'s) credit had been so shaken, that he (Dr.) doubted whether he could pay all his demands against him, and advised him to sell his property and pay what he could; this was denied by the doctor, who continued to assert his ability to pay all he owed.

In his testimony before the insolvent court, the relator declared that he had never been in the banking house but once, and in the store of Dr. D. but eight times during the operations of the bank; a witness has been examined who swears that, in the summer of 1838, he saw the relator, on four different Sundays, early in the morning, at Dr.'s house: twice saw him coming out, and twice saw him through the window, sitting with his back towards the blinds, which were down.

Another witness, who resides in the Northern Liberties, states he frequently saw the relator in his carriage or rig in front of Dr.'s door, between May and September, 1838; saw him at least two or three times a week, always, however, remaining in the stated that, talking to Dr. D. This witness further commenced his deposition as a depositor, and that when he saw the relator he was informed by Mr. Simpson and Dr. D. that Mr. Ridgway was security for the bank; in the latter part he is evidently mistaken, as his deposit commenced, as appears by his book, in November, 1836; the relator did not become trustee, nor was his name connected with the bank, until May, 1837. On the 11th of September, 1838, the bond for $500,000 was reassigned by the relator to the original obligees, (Simpson, Sneyd, & c.) and the judgment marked to their use; no other notice was given of this reassignment at that time; but at a meeting of the creditors of the bank in November of that year, the fact of the reassignment was mentioned; that meeting was called for the purpose of devising means to enable the bank to continue in operation; a committee was appointed to wait on the relator and solicit from him a loan of $30,000, but he declined making any further advance, and his other efforts appear to have been made by the committee.

I think this summary view of the evidence contains every fact in any way material either for the prosecution or defence, and that the counsel for the commonwealth insist that the relator be bound over to answer one or all of the specifications or counts before mentioned, and they urge that there is at least probable cause to put him on his trial; that a binding over can do no harm; if he is nugatory he will be acquitted by a jury, and his character triumpantly vindicated.

It is true that a binding over by a committing magistrate or by a judge, after a hearing on habeas corpus, ought not to prejudice a defendant on his trial before a jury, inasmuch as the testimony is almost always, and has been in this case, entirely ex parte, no evidence having been admitted on the part of the defendant; and if the evidence is such as to satisfy the magistrate or judge that there is probable cause to believe that the defendant has been guilty of a breach of the criminal laws of the country, it is his duty to bind him over for trial by a jury, where his defence will be heard and his guilt or innocence determined. But if, after a full examination of the testimony for the commonwealth, he is satisfied that the laws have not been infringed, or that the defendant was not a party to such infringement, it is equally his duty to discharge the accused from arrest.

The first charge or specification has been but slightly insisted on, and properly so; there is no part of the evidence which connects the relator with the establishment of this bank; on the contrary, it is proved to have been in existence before he had any connexion with Dyott; and, again, the conspiracy (if any) was merged in the consummation of the act, the establishment of the bank.

But it is said, if the proof is that the bank was established, and the conspiracy merged, it is our duty to bind over the relator for the offence of establishing an unlawful bank; this, however, is the mode of punishing such an offence; the bank, if unlawful, is made so by the act of 22d March, 1817, and the penalty is a fine, recoverable as debts of a like amount are by law recoverable, that is, by action, and not by indictment. The 13th section of the act of the 21st March, 1806, provides that "in all cases where a remedy is provided, or any thing or things directly to be done, by any act of assembly, the directions of the act shall be strictly pursued, and no penalty shall be inflicted or any thing done agreeably to the common law, further than is necessary for carrying such act or acts into effect." This then is a case precisely within the words of the statute; a remedy is provided, the punishment is fixed, and the mode of enforcing it is pointed out; if the remedy by indictment should also be permitted, the party would be subject to two penalties for one offence, which can never for one moment be tolerated.

The remaining charges or specifications may properly be considered together; in support of them, the commonwealth urges—

1st. The acceptance of the assignment, and making reassignment of the bond for $500,000.

2d. The frequent interviews between the relator and Dyott.

3d. The representations uniformly made of the solvency of the bank; and

4th. The relator's representations of solvency after he knew of the fraudulent transfer of the goods assigned to him as collateral security.

Without stopping now to inquire into the legal effect of the assignment, or how far a trustee can divest himself of trust except in the mode pointed out by law let us inquire what possible benefit could result to the relator, or injury to the creditors of Dr. Dyott, by the assignment or re-assignment of the bond: the judgment had been entered, and was a lien on the real estate of Dyott before it came into the hands of the relator; the objects of trusts of the bond were on record, and could not be changed; the assignment, whether legal or illegal, did not change nor lessen the rights or interests of the creditors, or in any way increase the security of the assignee; the assignment and delivery to him was in effect nothing more than if the bond had been deposited in the vault of a bank or other places of security until called for by the parties interested. But, it has been argued as though the reassignment of the bond was a surrender to Dr. Dyott of the rights of the creditors, and that at all events public notice should have been given to put creditors on their guard. If so, part of the real estate of Dr. D. had been released from the lien of the judgment, then indeed the creditors might have had ample cause to complain; but force, and it is in reality as great a security now as it was the first moment it came into the hands of the relator, the only difference being that the names of other persons must be used to enforce it, and, should they be unwilling to act, ample power is placed in the hands of the creditors to have active and willing trustees substituted.

As to the frequent interviews with doctor Dyott, the only circumstance that could make these at all material, is the statement of the relator that he had been but seldom at Dyott's house; but that statement was made long after the bank had exploded, when Dr. Dyott was under examination before the insolvent court, and when the declaration, if untrue, could have no possible effect either in benefiting him or injuring others. But, supposing it to be correct, pie, were in open day, he always remained in his considerable space of time; there was no concealment or secrecy in them such as to induce a supposition coated; and, as the visits of Dyott to the relator, of which so much has been said, they are explained at once by a reference to the account between the parties, from which it will be seen that during the pressure of April and May, 1837, the advances of money by the relator were almost daily, and sometimes twice on the same day.

The representations of the solvency of Dyott to the various persons who have been examined, remain to be considered. That he uniformly stated his belief of the ability of Dr. Dyott to pay his debts and redeem all his engagements, until the reassignment of the bond, is undoubted, and whether these representations are to make him liable to a criminal prosecution, or not, must depend on the motives with which they were made; these are to be ascertained from a view of the whole evidence. It must be recollected that this is not an inquiry whether the relator has, or has not, by his acts, made himself liable to the creditors of the bank for the amount of their debts; that is a question with which we have nothing to do here; the only question for us to determine being, is their cause to put him on trial as a criminal? It will be recollected that, with few exceptions, his statements were made to persons who called on him at his own house for information, and in almost every instance he informed the parties inquiring, that his information was founded on the representations of Dr. Dyott, the adaptation of the notes to his recommendations of the notes to Mr. Dowell, in the market, and his advice to Mr. Bean; but these were made at a time when the notes were generally in circulation, when he was advancing his own money to Dyott in support of his representations, and which he continued to do for more than a year after making these representations.

If these representations are to make him liable to a criminal prosecution, then would some of the witnesses for the commonwealth be in great danger, if their other creditors should think proper to prosecute them for a conspiracy. It is hardly probable that the respectable witness whom Dr. D. visited at his house, and who, when he saw one of the notes doubted in the market, offered to give silver for it, supposed he was risking more than the loss of his money, the amount of the note offered.

But it is said that Dr. Dyott having embezzled the goods pledged to him as a collateral security, the relator must have been aware of his dishonesty, and that he still continued his recommendation. The evidence is, that after he discovered the removal of the goods, he demanded additional security on the bond of J. B. and C. W. Dyott, dated 1st February, 1838; and we find that after that period he advanced to Dr. D. upwards of $9,000; the inference is therefore irresistible, that the cause of removal was satisfactorily explained.

Is there then in all this evidence any thing tending to prove that the relator, in making these representations, intended that injury should result from them to the persons to whom they were made? or that he was to be in any way benefitted by them? I think not; that he truly believed what he said, is, I think, undoubted, from the fact that he continued to advance his own money to the last, and that he is now a loser of upwards of $50,000 by his credulity.

But were the representations of the solvency of the bank untrue? It is a fact on which we cannot shut our eyes, although not given in evidence on this hearing, that, on the application of Dr. Dyott for the benefit of the insolvent laws, he was opposed on the ground, that he had colluded with various of his relatives to conceal property of greater value than all the debts he owed; that such was the testimony against him, we felt ourselves compelled to bring him over for trial for this concealment, and it is of public notoriety that he has been convicted; if, then, this conviction is correct, and we presume it to be so, Dr. Dyott was perfectly solvent and able to pay all his debts when these representations were made.

I have examined with care all the cases cited by counsel for the commonwealth, and many others, and I have been unable to find a single authority that would justify us in holding the relator to answer this charge on the evidence that has been exhibited to us. The cases cited, have for the most part been civil actions to recover damages sustained by the plaintiff, by the false and fraudulent representations of credit by a defendant—many of them of a most flagrant kind; but no intimation is given in any of them of the propriety of an offence. Indeed, until the case of Earley et al. vs. Freeman, (3 Jones' rep. 51), it was doubted whether a civil action would lie, even when the false affirmation of credit was made with intent to cheat the plaintiff. I have before said that with the civil liability of the relator we have nothing to do, if he has by his representations made himself liable to the creditors of Dr. Dyott for the amount of their claims; that is a question referable to another tribunal, and to be determined in another form, and on which we are not required, nor do we desire to express an opinion.

At the outset of this cause I adjourned the hearing for the purpose of enabling me to invite the aid and assistance of my brethren of the bench on the examination. This was promptly and kindly rendered, although at great personal inconvenience to themselves.

We have since been separated, and have separately considered the evidence exhibited in support of the prosecution. Within a few hours I have received from each of them a written opinion, (which I will presently proceed to read), containing the conclusion at which they have arrived. They both concur with me in the opinion that no criminal conspiracy has been proved, and that the relator must be discharged.

It may be proper to state that the testimony before the court was different from that before the mayor. Several witnesses, and among them one said to be the most important for the commonwealth, who were examined there, were not examined in court. What effect their testimony would have had it is impossible to tell. Should the counsel for the commonwealth think they can present a different case at a future day, it is gratifying to know that this decision does not preclude them from sending a bill to the grand jury whenever they may think proper to do.

OPINION OF JUDGE KING.

The mayor of Philadelphia, after a full and elaborate examination and consideration of the testimony adduced by the prosecution, came to the conclusion that sufficient probable cause had been exhibited to him to require the defendant to enter into recognizance for his appearance at the court of criminal sessions, to answer the charge of conspiring with Thomas W. Dyott to defraud the community. In arriving at this result, I presume that he considered the prosecution to grow out of the testimony, and to rest upon the broad foundation of a criminal combination between the parties to cheat and defraud through the device of an unlawful bank, with a pretended and fictitious capital. Such, at least, are the views I take of the case, and unless the testimony is adequate for this purpose, it is without efficacy as to proof of any other criminal liability. Viewing the commitment of the mayor as substantially, though perhaps not formally, the only one which the evidence before him indicated, it remains for us to consider whether, according to the evidence exhibited to us, we are required to concur in or dissent from his views, as expressed in his commitment. If our conclusions should be, at issue with his, it is due to this respectable officer to observe that we are without the testimony of the chief witness, on which it is probable his adjudication mainly rested. I allude to the testimony of Stephen Simpson, who, when required to testify before us, declined doing so on grounds, the correctness of which we felt bound by the constitution and laws of the commonwealth to recognize. The subject before us is, therefore, rather the examination of a new case, than the revision of a former decision.

The first element in the correct determination of any proposition submitted to the understanding is exactness in the appreciation of the thing to be determined upon. It is to the want of clearness in this particular that much misunderstanding as to this case is to be attributed. I have said that the testimony either sufficiently establishes a conspiracy to defraud the public, through the instrumentality of an unlawful bank, with a fictitious or exaggerated capital, or that it altogether fails in fixing any criminal liability on the defendant. In this view of the matter, what then is the subject submitted to us? It is simply and plainly whether the prosecution has, independently of the testimony of Stephen Simpson, shown to us sufficient probable cause to satisfy us judicially that Jacob Ridgway has fraudulently and corruptly combined and confederated with Thomas W. Dyott to cheat and defraud the citizens, through the instrumentality of the Manual Labor bank. It is not a question whether Thomas W. Dyott has individually been guilty of fraudulent practices, or even whether such an imputation can be fairly charged on Jacob Ridgway; but whether, according to the evidence adduced before us, these parties have, by pre-concert and pre-arrangement, united in a formed design to cheat the public. The vital principle of this charge is the fraudulent and corrupt combination between the alleged confederates in crime; and this combination the commonwealth must prove, either by direct evidence, or through the exhibition of such circumstances as necessarily tend to its establishment. The crime of criminal conspiracy to cheat and defraud is a grave one, and may, if established, be punished to the extent of seven years in the State Solitude or a penal cell. Such a crime is, therefore, not to be charged on any man from vague circumstances, strained presumptions, or jealous surmises. Any citizen, be he humble or lofty, who has lived a life of unsuspected integrity in the community; has the fair right to require of an examining tribunal that, before he is to be arraigned as a felon at the bar of criminal justice, reasonable preliminary proof of his guilt should be adduced. A mere binding over to answer for a crime is a thing very flippantly talked of even by professional men; but common sense and observation show that such a result never fails, where the charge is infamous, in inflicting an injury on the feelings and fame, which is rarely if ever healed. Every dictate of reason, and every impulse of humanity, render these principles indisputable. It is so just as true that, in every criminal investigation, the testimony should apply to the offence charged. Whatever other moral delinquencies or legal liabilities it may tend to prove different from the offence charged, they can only be considered so far as they may tend to establish such offence. This principle is of the last degree of importance to the safety of every citizen. Without it, liberty would be a baseless shadow, and public justice a wicked mockery. It may be true that Jacob Ridgway has been guilty of such a breach of trust in reference to the manner in which his duties under the trust bond have been executed, as to render him responsible to the extent of the sum which that instrument purports to secure. It may be that, independently of his fiduciary character, he has rendered himself personally liable to some or all of the creditors of the Manual Labor bank, in consequence of misrepresenting the pecuniary means of its founder and the solvency of his bank. It may be that he has subjected himself, to penalties under the laws of the commonwealth for the restraint and punishment of unlawful banking. For all these, and any other imputations urged against him, he may be called to answer in due course of law. But the matter in hand is none of these, and upon them I give no opinion. It is whether Jacob Ridgway shall or shall not be bound over by us to a criminal court, to answer for an infamous offence, for which, if convicted, he must undergo the punishment of the robber and the felon. From this result the creditors of the Manual Labor bank could legitimately derive no personal or pecuniary benefit. Nor would Jacob Ridgway satisfy one cent of any legal liability he may be under to any creditor of this bank, if he were detained in penal confinement under the action of this prosecution, until he gasped in a dungeon his latest breath. He who reflects on these things with the dispassionate calmness which ought always to pertain to him who assumes to pass judgment on the actions of his fellow men, will readily see the necessity of separating, in such an inquiry, things so separate which are in themselves distinct; and will as readily appreciate the monstrous injustice of holding a party guilty of an infamous crime, who may have incurred, even under censurable circumstances, a mere civil liability.

A breach of duty as a trustee, and deliberate crime—misrepresentations as to another man's pecuniary means, and conspiracy with him to defraud the community—are different things; and even if the testimony should, before the appropriate tribunals, be deemed sufficient to prove such a breach of trust, or such misrepresentations, it by no means follows that the same testimony establishes criminal conspiracy. The sole question, however, before us is, the sufficiency of testimony for the latter purpose, and to that our opinion is to be understood as applying.

Having a due regard to these principles, I have carefully weighed and considered all the testimony exhibited to us, and some detached parts of it, in the circumstances of an unequivocal character; but, in the aggregate, I see nothing to satisfy my judgment that Jacob Ridgway has ever entered into a conspiracy with Thomas W. Dyott, to defraud the community, or to effect, by criminal combination, any other object. Such being the conclusion to which my mind has arrived, after an anxious consideration of the whole case, I should be recreant to my duty if I hesitated to say so. I do not assume this judgment to be infallible, but, being my judgment, a sense of duty of higher obligation than any human consideration imperatively demands that I should unhesitatingly pronounce it.

I rejoice, however, that our judgment is not conclusive of the subject. The sole effect of this decision is, that in the present state of the evidence we see no sufficient cause to hold the defendant to bail. It is still competent for the proper public officer, particularly in a different state of the evidence, to bring the case to the grand jury. That respectable body are entirely independent of us; they can form their own views of the prosecutor's case, and may, if their judgment so indicate, place the defendant on his trial; we at present do not see adequate cause to induce us neither to restrain him of his liberty, or compel him to give bail to answer. He is discharged.

OPINION OF JUDGE JONES.

On an examination of the evidence and the law applicable to the case of Jacob Ridgway, I can arrive but on one conclusion.

The law of conspiracy I find involved in great confusion. Interpreted by some English writers, it is used to create a mysterious crime, which a tribunal, over whom a citizen is accused, when two or more persons are implicated may mould out of actions otherwise the most innocent. This interpretation I consider as totally inadmissible on any authority, and in part the most erroneous and positive. I do not see how a judge representing a free people could without his express authority recognize a vague offence which might be stretched by a bold interpreter into monstrous tyranny. The doctrine may suit the laide of England, but is not congenial here. Happily those writers are not fully supported by the authorities they cite, and are contradicted by equally good authorities. Amid such contradiction, it is difficult to define with accuracy the law; but taking those principles which are best supported, and that interpretation which is most accordant with our position as judges administering the laws of a people jealous of their liberties, I do not think that we can make a crime of conspiracy out of the evidence before us.

Bound as we ourselves are, bound as the subordinate magistrates of city and county are, by our oaths, to decide that the facts proved before us are a criminal conspiracy would be a most dangerous precedent. We act on general principles, and not to persecute, but to hold up the shield of the law for the protection of all alike: with us no man is rich who has done wrong, no man is poor who is innocent; and we ought to guard well lest a person which to-day concerns a wealthy citizen, to-morrow means to procure bail and defend himself before a jury, should to-morrow rise up with fearful effort against the poor and friendless and unprotected. Viewing the case thus, our duty is clear. It would undoubtedly be gratifying to some of the weakness of human nature to refer this case to a jury, and thus throw off ourselves the responsibility of a decision. But we cannot do so without violating our duties and our oaths, and it would be only postponing responsibility. When a case is on trial, it is our function to define the law, and if the facts proved do not amount to the crime, we must so instruct the jury, and direct an acquittal; if they disregard our direction, we must grant a new trial. Exactly as our responsibility would then be upon us, is it upon the jury. To send this case to a jury, even if we could legitimately do so, would be useless and void. If the defendant, as an American citizen, has his rights, has a positive right to a discharge, if we are of opinion, as I am, that the facts alleged against him, even supposing them proved do not amount to conspiracy.

Of the civil liability of the defendant I need not say a word. On the criminal charge I do not think he can be held to answer. I am therefore, of opinion that he must be discharged.

CASE OF T. W. DYOTT.

Before judges Todd and Conrad, Saturday, August 10, 1839.

COMMONWEALTH vs. T. W. DYOTT.

Fraudulent Insolvency.

Decision on the motion for a new trial. The opinion of the court, on the motion for a new trial, was delivered on Saturday, by judge Jones. We have obtained the following report of a decision:

Of the reasons for a new trial originally filed, were not urged, and others were comprehended in the motion in arrest of judgment. The only points on which it is necessary to express the views of the court, are as follows:

1. It is urged that the printed arrangement of business placed in the common please docket, is the only evidence which sustains the allegation in the indictment of the appointment of a day for the hearing of Dr. Dyott's petition; and that this arrangement, or order, having been made anterior to the filing of the petition, it is not in fact or law the action of the court on that petition. The docket entered in evidence, containing the printed order of business, was sworn to as the record of the court in common pleas, and received as such. Without determining whether the allegation referred to be material, the court considered the opinion that the evidence introduced was competent in itself and sufficient to establish the fact alleged.—The act of the 16th day of June, 1836, makes it the duty of the court of common please to fix a time for the hearing of the petition, either by a general rule, or by an order made in a particular case, if the circumstances of the case shall require it. The necessity of public business have induced in Philadelphia the appointment of a general day for the hearing of insolvent cases; and the order of the court takes effect on each petition as subsequently filed. An opposite construction would be contrary to the clear intent and reason of the law and well settled and necessary practice.

2. It is alleged also, as a reason for a new trial, that the court erred in rejecting "evidence of what Stephen Simpson had sworn to in the insolvent court, which he had not sworn to in this case." The testimony was offered as additional not contradictory, and was offered without any cross examination of the witness. There can be no doubt that, before any such evidence can be admitted, a basis must be laid in the cross examination, and the witness be afforded an opportunity of explanation. To open the door to evidence intended to discredit a witness, by proof that he has previously made additional or different statements, without permitting him to supply what is forgotten, or explain what may be misunderstood, would be gross injustice to him, and would induce consequences fatal to the precision of judicial investigation.

3. The ground principally relied on is an after discovered writing, which, it is alleged, would discredit the testimony of Stephen Simpson, one of the witnesses for the prosecution. We have given to this point the most careful attention, but, after revising the testimony and weighing, as well as we can, the scope and effect of the after discovered evidence, was considered insufficient to warrant us in opening the verdict.

The conviction on the sixth and seventh counts of this indictment, to the former of which Mr. Simpson's testimony does not apply materially, and to the latter not at all. These counts are unreachd by this reason for a new trial, and on them the court would at all events be constrained to proceed to judgment.

The after discovered testimony is merely cumulative—the same facts were stated on the trial by John B. Dyott. Nor can it be urged that the writing produced discredits the witness by a higher order of evidence than that just mentioned; for on another point the defence contradicted the same witness by his own handwriting.

Had the witness alluded to been unimpeached on the trial, and were his testimony now wholly blotted out of the case by after discovered evidence of discredit, still we are of opinion that the case is so sustained by other testimony that even if a new trial were granted a different result would scarcely be possible. The testimony of S. Simpson is (perhaps with the exception of a single one of the eleven counts of this indictment) not essential to the prosecution; and were it torn from the tissue of the case, would leave no opening through which the defendant could escape the condemnation under which he now rests.

Motion overruled.

CONSUL TRIST.

From the N. Y. Express of Saturday last.

Pursuant to notice, one of the largest and most respectable meetings of shipmasters ever assembled in this city, met on Thursday evening at the Second Ward Hotel, for the purpose of consultation, and of taking further measures in reference to consul Trist, and the shipmasters and seamen abandoned and oppressed by the said consul, at Havana. Captain Edward Rosseter was called to the chair; Capt. J. Hillman, Henry Russell, Jas. W. Low, were appointed vice presidents; and caps. S. E. Glover and R. Ritchie were appointed secretaries.

The objects of the meeting being stated by the president, capt. Rosseter, the following preamble and resolutions were offered by capt. S. E. Glover.

Whereas, it is the bounden duty of every United States ministerial or consular agent abroad, and especially the peculiar province of consuls and consular agents, vigilantly to watch over and carefully to protect and guard the interests of American commerce and seamen from foreign aggression, as well as prevent harsh treatment of crews by shipmasters, and to put down and punish mutinous insurrections or other difficulties occurring on board of all vessels in foreign ports: And whereas, such authentic facts have been stated to this meeting as prove conclusively that Nicholas P. Trist, the consul at Havana, has been guilty of secretly inciting the Spanish authorities to the unlawful confinement and imprisonment of American captains and seamen for alleged and unfounded offences, preferred by him against them; and when remonstrances were presented to the said Trist, against his high-handed conduct, by one hundred and fifty-five respectable shipmasters and citizens of Havana, comprising nearly all that reside there, and that the said remonstrance, when laid before him by commander Babbit, of the United States sloop of war Boston, then in port, he, the said consul, treated the same with contemptuous scorn, and so misrepresented his proceedings, as fully to establish, by his own admissions, the truth of the accusations against him. Therefore, be it

Resolved, as the sense of this meeting, that the conduct of the said Trist has been wanton, tyrannical, unlawful and unjust, and highly injurious and offensive to our profession.

Resolved, That the proceedings of the said consul, in encouraging the Spanish authorities to bring to unlawful trial, on exaggerated charges, the crew of the American ship "William Eng's," and causing them to be condemned without counsel or trial by jury, and sentenced, to the common felons, to chains and hard labor, in breaking stones under Spanish task masters, is enough to stamp the name of Trist with infamy, and to prove him totally unworthy to hold his high and, what ought to be, honorable station.

Resolved, That the tyrannical, illegal, and unjust imprisonment of captain Abraham Wendell, jr. of the brig Kremlin, of this port, during a protracted period of five months, and his continuance under bonds for an additional period of three months, on the false accusations brought by said Trist against capt. Wendell, in the Spanish courts, and which he failed in any instance to sustain, is another evidence of the tyrannical and malignant spirit of persecution which has constantly marked the conduct of said Trist towards his countrymen.

Resolved, That in our opinion, the letter which has been subsequently written by the said Trist, and recently published in the New Orleans Courier, and subsequently in the Globe and other papers, concerning the interference of commander Babbit, and in which letter, he, the said Trist, denounces his accusers, meaning thereby nearly all Americans in Havana, as a "set of the vilest and most notorious wretches," as "dirty, sneaking knaves," and "characters of the deepest infamy," is by the gross and billingsgate epithets it employs, corroborative and conclusive evidence that he is unfit for the dignified office he disgraces, as he is destitute of the feelings of an American, and unworthy the name of a gentleman.

Resolved, That the confession made by him in the said letter, that he had been convinced that the captain of the "William Eng's" should have been made to break stones in place of his crew, is an additional proof of his guilt in forcing that crew to prison through the agency of the Spanish tribunals, and in moving, when too late, a mean attempt at subterfuge, and to wit, ever, at the expense of a base and unfounded aspersion upon the captain, and the good opinion of the crew upon whom he had been instrumental in the commission of a most flagrant outrage.

Resolved, That the calumnious insinuations thrown out in the aforesaid letter of the said Trist upon the American ship masters and residents of Havana, that he could have bought their good opinion with dinners and other courtesies, is worthy of the author who uttered it, as no other individual but one possessing his hostile feelings toward his countrymen, could have measured the integrity and independence of American citizens by a standard so sordid and corruptible.

Resolved, That the great body of Americans, ship masters and citizens of Havana, whose names are attached to the memorial presented to capt. Babbit, as well as the names of those who attend this meeting, fling back these reproachful expressions of consul Trist, and warn him to clear up his character first, and especially to warn him to clear up the documents printed by the British minister, inculating the said Trist as the British minister in the slave trade, before he has the effrontery to accuse others of being bribed by the courtesies or any other favor he can bestow.

Resolved, That we respectfully urge upon the seamen and ship masters of every city in the union, to co-operate in the adoption of such measures as may bring to a speedy recall of the aforesaid Nicholas P. Trist, for his oppression, illegal and unjust outrages upon American citizens, that he may be summoned to trial to atone for conduct which is not only disgraceful to him as an individual, but is dishonorable to our country in a foreign land.

Resolved, That a memorial be presented to the proper authorities for the removal of the aforesaid consul Trist, and that a committee be appointed to prepare and superintend the same: whereupon the following captains were appointed upon said committee: captains Hillman, Russell, Low, J. E. Glover, Atkins; captains S. E. Glover and Ritchie as secretaries.

Resolved, That the unblushing attempt of the said consul, to vindicate himself, and to challenge his accuser to the proof, while he reiterates offensive epithets upon the heads of respectable American ship masters and citizens residing in, or trading to Havana, is another additional evidence of the effect of the intoxication of office upon the mind of a person, whose recent conduct proves him to be by nature prone to acts of the most flagitious description.

Resolved, That in consideration of the extreme severity and harsh treatment received by captain Wendell, at the hands of the aforesaid Trist, and in consequence of the sufferings and privations experienced during his confinement, by a numerous family, consisting of a wife and five daughters, we do cheerfully agree to raise a fund to sustain capt. Wendell in a civil suit in the courts of the United States against the said consul Trist, and who do therefore recommend that subscription papers be opened for this purpose.

Resolved, That the proceedings of the meeting be signed by the president, vice presidents and secretaries of this meeting, and that all the papers in the city be and they are hereby requested to publish the same.

Capt. EDWARD ROSSETER, president.

J. HILLMAN, }
HENRY RUSSELL, } vice presidents.
JAMES W. LOW, }

S. E. Glover, }
R. Ritchie, } secretaries.

On motion of captain S. E. Glover, the resolutions were unanimously adopted.

During the meeting captain Wendell was called on to make a statement of his case, which he did in a concise, clear and feeling manner, eliciting from his professional brethren every mark of manly sympathy.—This was both natural and honorable—men who have braved every danger of sea and tempest in every clime have a common feeling, for what has been the fate of one to-day, may be the fate of another to-morrow; and the same assumption of power claimed and exercised by Trist, at Havana, may consign the seamen or masters of American vessels to the tender mercies of the dey of Algiers, the pacha of Egypt, the grand Turk, or to be strangled by the Chinese mandarins, when it shall suit the whims of a consul sustained by the authority of Trist, to deliver up American seamen to foreign authorities, for alleged offences committed under the American flag. Due notice will be given of another meeting.

GOVERNOR SEWARD'S LETTER.

From the Truth Teller.

We refer our readers to the correspondence between governor Seward and the rev. Mr. Gilbride, published in this day's paper. It is a document worthy of perusal, and we give it to the public with much pleasure. In these days of bigotry when the Catholic, even in this land of freedom, suffers from the sneers and scoffs of some, and the ruthless persecution of others,—when we see public men flying from the charge of Catholicity as it were a pestilence,—and historians like Mr. Bancroft, rewarded with high and responsible offices for base and unwarrantable attacks upon the Catholic faith, it is refreshing to peruse a document, such as the one we now lay before our readers. The governor's letter contains a clear exposition of the law, and a lucid explanation of the rights of the Catholic clergy, which cannot but claim the attention of the Catholic community. Governor Seward, in this instance, has displayed a liberal and highminded course, and his conduct shows the more conspicuously, from the fact that the party with which he is identified has always been characterised by an entirely opposite course. Differing as we do in toto in political principles with the party who placed governor Seward in power, we beg to assure him we shall not be backward in awarding our meed of praise to him when he pursues such a line of conduct as the one which he has in this case adopted towards adopted citizens.

Congress Hall, Albany, June 29th, 1839.

Sir: Herewith I have the honor to transmit to your excellency the form of an affidavit to which I am ready to swear.

Said form contains the facts upon which I submit to your excellency an application for relief touching the case of Lawrence McCarthy, sentenced to be executed on the first day of August next, and now confined at Martinsburg, in the county jail of Lewis.

Those facts embrace a subject of such deep importance not only to said convict, to the entire body of Catholics towards whom a policy has been pursued in the extreme illiberal, and unknown to the laws of any civilized nation, but also to religious liberty, whose sacred charter has been assailed, that I am inadequate to express my solicitude for a favorable hearing, and my utter abhorrence at so flagrant a violation of the rights of conscience.

This emergency, in the opinion of the undersigned, loudly calls for the interposition of the executive of the state.

I therefore very respectfully and anxiously solicit your excellency to postpone the execution of said convict so that the legislature may be petitioned at its next session for an amendment of the law relating to this subject, if its intervention is deemed necessary, and to grant such other relief in the premises as your excellency may deem just and equitable.

Fully relying on your wisdom to decide, and on your firmness to execute what principle demands, I submit this truly distressing case to your excellency without further remark.

I have the honor to be, your excellency's obedient servant,

MICHAEL GILBRIDE,
R. C. P. of Carthage, &c. &c. &c.

Albany, June 29th, 1839.

Sir: The reverend Michael Gilbride, a Roman Catholic clergyman residing at Carthage, has made a representation to me that he is pastor of a mission in Jefferson county, embracing Lowville and Martinsburg, in the county of Lewis; that Lawrence McCarthy, a prisoner in the jail of Martinsburg, who was recently convicted of the murder of Asabel Alford, and was sentenced to suffer death on the first day of August next, is a member of the Roman Catholic church; that the said Gilbride received information that the prisoner desired his spiritual aid; that he thereupon proceeded to Martinsburg for the purpose of administering the rites of his religion to the said prisoner, and that he was informed by the jailer, Mr. Daniel S. Bailey, that he was instructed not to admit any person to the prisoner, unless the said jailer should be present and hear the conversation between him and the prisoner.—Mr. Gilbride further states, that he consulted the district attorney of Lewis county, to ascertain whether he could obtain admission to the prisoner by making personal application to you, and was informed by the district attorney, that you had conversed with him on the subject, and had said that you considered yourself bound by the statute not to admit any person to the prisoner alone, and that consequently his application must be denied. Upon this representation, Mr. Gilbride asks my interposition in the premises.

Where the constitution and laws give to the executive no control over other functionaries, it would be disrespectful to them, and disorganizing to the administration of justice were I to assume authority. But general duty, "to take care that the laws are faithfully executed," undoubtedly authorizes me to advise other executive officers upon any question which may arise touching the manner of discharging their duties. I deem it therefore improper to express respectfully to you my view on the subject thus brought before me.

In the first place, I am not satisfied that you have refused compliance with Mr. Gilbride's request.—The conduct of the jailer, and his refusal to admit Mr. Gilbride unless attended by himself were clearly right. It is a prudent precaution against the prisoner's escape, to provide generally that no person should visit him except in the presence of an officer, and the jailer might well adhere to this line of duty unless otherwise expressly directed by you.—Mr. Gilbride ought not to have been deterred by the information given him by the district attorney from making his application to you personally. He has therefore no right to presume that a personal application to you would have been denied.

But the subject is one of grave importance, and the time of a man lying under sentence of death is inestimably precious. I have therefore thought it proper, under the circumstances of the case, to express my opinion upon the reasonableness of the request itself.

It is the manifest duty of the sheriff to keep secure the persons of individuals lying under conviction and sentence of death. It is equally his duty that a proper precaution should be used, to forbid access to, or conversation with them, except in the presence of an officer of justice. The provision of law which bears on this subject, is contained in the 11th section of article 1st, title 1st, chapter, 3d, part 4th of the revised statutes, vol. 2d, page 633.

"§ 11. Prisoners detained for trial, may converse with their counsel, and such other persons as the keeper, in his discretion, may allow; prisoners under sentence shall not be permitted to hold any conversation with any person, except the keepers or inspectors of the prison, unless in the presence of a keeper or inspector."

It is true that so much of this section as relates to "prisoners under sentence" is broad enough to embrace all classes of offenders who have been convicted and sentenced to punishment, whether that punishment be death, imprisonment in the state prison, or imprisonment in the county jail. The policy of the law doubtless, is chiefly to guard against the escape and rescue of prisoners. So far as concerns those who are confined under sentence of imprisonment in the county jail, it may have a further object of regulation and even severity of punishment.—But it can have no such object so as prisoners detained under sentence of death is concerned.

Indeed, an examination of the 1st section of article above quoted will show that the legislator had probably no reference in their article to the lower class of prisoners. The 1st section is as follows, page 632.

"Section 1. The common jail in the several counties of this state shall be kept by the sheriffs of the counties in which they are respectively situated, and shall be used as prisons.

"1st. For the detention of persons duly committed in order to secure their attendance as witnesses in any criminal case.

"2d. For the detention of persons charged with crime and committed for trial.

"3d. For the confinement of persons duly committed for any contempt, and "4th. For the confinement of persons sentenced to imprisonment therein, upon conviction of a offence."

Persons imprisoned under sentence of death at awaiting execution, are included among those whose custody the article makes provision, but their imprisonment is incidental, and it may be supposed that it is not regarded as a part of the punishment. From this view of the statute, I think it manifest that the spirit of the law does not apply to the prisoner confined in the county jail under sentence of death, as of imprisonment in the state prison, and awaiting execution or removal.

The condition of a human being under sentence of death is undoubtedly most fearful and unhappy. Our laws, content with the atonement of the prisoner's death, do not require or contemplate the addition of any circumstances of terror or unnecessary privation. They require distress only because it is necessary, and they enforce it only in so far as it is necessary to prevent the prisoner's escape or rescue. Humanity dictates that the prisoner's condition should be made as comfortable and cheerful as it can be consistently with his purpose.

The chief consolation of the prisoner is derived from the visits of friends and humane individuals and experience has shown that of such visitation the most consoling and most effectual in producing penitence and hope is that of ministers of religion. Hence it is that the duty of visitation enjoined by the Christian religion itself. It is declared to be one of the grounds of acceptance in our final judgment, "I was in prison and ye came unto me."

So far as my knowledge goes, no Christian se has failed to enjoy the performance of this duty of visitation upon its ministers, while some of them, the Catholics and Episcopalians, have a ritual prepared for such occasions. What Christianity enjoins our laws and customs both tolerate and encourage. From time immemorial, the judges have concluded the solemn services of the court pronounced upon the prisoner with the prayer, "and may thy Lord have mercy upon your soul." A custom old, and as uniform, has sanctioned the visit of ministers of the gospel to prepare the prisoner for the "mercy" which the judge implores. Our statute authorise the attendance of ministers at the execution, but we all know that their offices, however important, are then less desired and less important to the unfortunate convict than during the season of imprisonment which intervenes before the execution. Humanity as well as Christianity would condemn the sheriff or jailer, who would refuse the ministers of the gospel admittance to the convict's cell. But it may be answered, that this privilege is not denied in the present case; that it not abused and perverted to defeat the cause of justice. And it will be asked "is not the precaution reasonable?" I answer that it is reasonable where the religious faith of the convict and of the ministry he religious does not object to such publicity. But it is certainly consistent with the spirit of toleration which pervades our free institutions, that the convict should enjoy the visits of ministers of his own faith, whatever that faith may be, whether Catholic or Protestant. It is well understood to be an article of the Catholic religion, that confession before death in order to be effectual to obtain the Divine pardon ought to be made to a priest, and that that confession must be made without witness; it seems to me that the same principle of toleration requires that the Catholics should be allowed their privilege. According to his faith, the solace of visitation are vain and a mockery, if they are administered by the functionary and in the manner which that faith prescribes. To refuse compliance with the peculiar manner which his conscience dictates is to deny the solace altogether. By the fiction he is entitled to as free privileges in relation to creed as the Protestant who believes that salvation should be made in another form. As a testant, I should execrate the treaty which in that country would deny to one of my countrymen in a similar situation the consolation of reliever the form approved by his own conscience, as an American, I should blush for the bigotry which would upon any plea, deny to the Roman Catholic equal indulgence. It is not a sufficient answer to say that the priest may abuse his privileges. Members of the society of Friends are permitted to give evidence upon their simple affirmation upon an oath. It is no valid objection to that to say that Friends like other men may affirm.

As far as I have information the rite of private confession has never been denied to Catholics in this country and I should be unwilling to construe the law as having quoted as requiring such a denial to foreseen by the legislature. The reason the law does not apply, and I doubt not that the law of the statute would be shocked by the application of it. I do not hesitate therefore to say the presence of a keeper or inspector" here referred to may, and ought to be dispensed with, and the prisoner ought to be permitted to make his confession and receive the solaces of religion with- out being overheard by any other than his confessor or great judge of the living and the dead.

It is undoubtedly true that the sheriff may, and has no access to a priest, if he has good reason to suspect that it is his purpose to abuse it by enabling the prisoner to escape, and therefore if the law refuses a discretion in the sheriff; and where he has doubts, though upon insufficient grounds to justify a refusal of private conversation, he should adopt such other precautions as may be necessary to counteract the supposed design of the priest. In the present case, I am not informed that there is any such pretence. Mr. Gilmore recommended to me as a respectable, and pious man.

Chiefly for the purpose of affording opportunity of repentance and preparation for death that, unlike those of most other countries, provide execution of the prisoner within a shorter than four weeks after his conviction. That being period is expected to be devoted to reflection for death, and the instances are so rare as to excite astonishment where the prisoner does not seek the spiritual aid of the ministry of his

Mr. Gilbride has misunderstood, as is not only your views on the subject, this communication unnecessary, and I excuse myself for writing you with it only upon the ground of solicitude that the prisoner may not, through any fault of government be deprived of the religious privileges he desires and needs. If on the other hand, as he supposes, decided that Mr. Gilmore be permitted to administer the approaches of his church, I respectfully recommend I reconsider the subject, and grant his application. I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. M. H. SEWARD.

Sheriff of the county of Lewis.

Denmark, Lewis co. July 11, 1839.
Cecily Wm. H. Seward, governor of the State of New York, Albany.

On my return from Albany, I presented Cecily's letter to the sheriff of the county of the desired effect.

I wrote writing to your excellency until I have seen the unhappy convict, lest when I apply for admission to him, some fresh word induce the good authorities at Marsh to deny my access.

My pressing imperative necessity prevented me writing him sooner than to-day, but to-day I cannot proceed farther until I acquire my duty which pleasure and honor prompt me to do. A distressing case in which I was obliged to your excellency two features were prominent in the case the recommendation in your letter, application should again be made to Cecily for some other and effectual relief, therefore, necessitated to rush upon you unreasonable hours and use an urgency unbecomable. Your unfeigned affability of expedition, and despatch, were prominently striking, and cheered the gloom with which the sad peculiarities of the case had afflicted me.

An unfortunate being was under sentence of death, he was rapidly approaching the awful moment which should finish his earthly career, and place him in that terrifying condition spoken of by St. Paul, xc. 31v. ad. Heb. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, he cries out for the savor of that religion, whose holy admonitions and salutary influence he had so long cried in vain, his entreaties are unheard, he has the anguish to behold the minister of his religion whom he so much desired, refused to enter his lonely cell, and he is left to the enjoyment of feelings better felt than described.

For the relief of this wretched man's soul you interfered and you have the happiness of thinking that you were perhaps the means in the hands of God, of enabling him to pronounce on one of his prodigal children the happy benediction of the parent, rather than the harrowing sentence of the judge.

Religious liberty was grossly assailed, you told the terrified maiden not to dread, you extended the executive arm and snatched her from the grasp of her would be destroyer.

In my own name, therefore permit me to thank you for your excellency for the courteous manner of intercourse with me under such peculiar circumstances. I thank you in the name of the Holy Redeemer, whose blood, I hope, your intervention has been instrumental in applying to one of his weak and sinful creatures.

I thank you, in the name of religious liberty, whose sacred character you rescued from the polluted embrace of the sacrilegious rascal.

Wishing you the long enjoyment of the direct consciousness of the gentleman, and of the Christian. I am, with sentiments of sincere respect and high esteem, your excellency's obedient servant.

MICHAEL GILBRIDE.

INTERESTING CORRESPONDENCE.

Suffolk, Virginia, 10th April, 1839.

The hon. Henry Clay:

SIR: At a meeting of the whigs of Nansemond county, recently held in the town of Suffolk, a resolution was unanimously adopted, declaring "that the gallant stand of the southern whig members of the late congress of the United States, and particularly the efforts of Messrs. Clay, of the senate, Stanley of North Carolina, Prentiss of Mississippi, and Wise, of our own state, of the house of representatives, to expose and check the fell demon of abolition, entitle them to the cordial thanks and gratitude of the friends of peace and good order, throughout the whole southern country."

It was also resolved, That a committee of three be appointed, who shall proceed forthwith, to transmit to the honorable gentlemen specially designated in said resolution, a copy thereof, and express to them the high estimation entertained of their services in congress, generally, by the whigs of Nansemond."

SIR, the whigs of Nansemond have assigned as a duty entirely consonant to the sentiments of our own bosoms, and as their honored organ, we take a proud pleasure in communicating to you their enunciation of the exalted sense of gratitude and admiration which they entertain for your profound and eminent talents, high and lofty patriotism, and the long and brilliant list of your public services. In common with them, and with all of our political household, we feel for your sir, the profoundest esteem and admiration.

We will not, on the present occasion, enter into a political descent on the flagitious misdeeds of our weak and vicious rulers. To you, sir, they are known in all their horrid enormity. And your fearless denunciation of, and indefatigable opposition to the reckless authors of those misdeeds, eminently entitle you to the love and veneration of every patriot in America. We will only remark, that we ascribe the causes of the mournful degeneracy in political virtue and morality and the consequent unhappy condition of public affairs, mainly, to the election of Andrew Jackson to the presidency of the United States—a man whose imbecility of intellect and bellicose propensities and passions, rendered him totally unfit for any civil office—the tenor of whose life exhibited an almost unbroken series of tyranny and immorality. And yet the people selected him above all others, to preside over their destinies. The sanction thus given to his nefarious acts, seems, indeed, to have been viewed by him as a commission of indulgence, to go on, and sin with impunity.

The wily little Dutchman, the Machiavel of America, resolved to avail himself of the elastic faith and patient spirit of the people, and therefore threw himself in the wake of his "illustrious predecessor" and "followed in his footsteps."

Amidst the gloomy prospects which surround us, it is animating to turn our eyes to the sages and patriots of the land. We behold in you, sir, the eminent statesman, the immaculate patriot—pre- eminent, in rendering "brilliant services" to his country, has never been actuated by the low and sordid motives of self-interest, but countering all such degrading impulses, has ever acted upon the principle of an expanded philanthropy and patriotism. One, who, in all his actions "had rather be right than be president;" and who throughout his life has endeavored to unite his own glory with the welfare and happiness of his country. With every sentiment of respect, your obt' serv'ts,

JOHN C. CRUMP,
JOHN H. COHOON,
THOMAS C. P. GODWIN.

Asbland, 25th May, 1839.

GENTLEMEN: I duly received the letter which you did me the honor to address me, transmitting a copy of a resolution adopted at a meeting of the whigs of Nansemond county, recently held.

Whilst I but too sensibly feel that they have placed an estimate entirely too high and flattering upon my capacity and upon the public services which I have been able to render, it affords me very great satisfaction to learn that I have been so fortunate as to obtain their approbation; and I request you to communicate to those whom you represent, my respectful and grateful acknowledgements for the sentiments of respect and esteem with an expression of which they have honored me.

At the session of congress prior to the last, I presented resolutions to the senate, touching the institution of domestic slavery, embracing all the principles applicable to the subject, the maintenance of which appeared to me necessary to the security of property, the stability of our system of general government, and harmony among the states of the union. At the last session of congress, the ultra abolitionists had presented themselves under a new and alarming aspect. Instead of restricting their exertions to moral persuasion, addressed to the consciences of slave holders, keeping aloof from parties and politics, as they originally professed to be their intention, they had openly proclaimed their purpose to enter the political arena, and denouncing all who did not adopt their dogmas and agree with them, to force their principles and their men by the aid of the ballot box. It required but little foresight to discern the frightful consequences which would result from this change of their position, if they should succeed. The union would be first convulsed throughout, and finally broken into fragments. I thought therefore at the last session, that the time was suitable to warn the country of their designs and efforts; and hence the speech which has commended itself to the approbation of the whigs of Nansemond. That speech is but an expansion of the argument embodied in the resolutions of the previous session. And I shall be most happy if it should contribute any thing towards arresting the mad career of these misguided men, and towards preserving that union which is the trust guaranty of all the high privileges which we enjoy.

In the constitution of that union there is not a solitary provision, fairly interpreted and fairly administered, which authorises any interference of congress with domestic slavery, as it exists in the United States. There is not one, relating to the subject, which does not recognise and treat slaves as lawful property, or look to the safety and security of that property. The clause which fixes the representation in the popular branch of congress, establishes a ratio founded upon the acknowledged existence of slavery; and in the appointment of direct taxes among the states, slaves are assumed to be lawful property. On the occasion of the imposition of a direct tax, to prosecute the last war with Great Britain, slaves were taxed by congress, as slaves, and their proprietors paid the tax accordingly. The provision which secures the surrender of fugitive slaves to their owners, of course, admits that they are legitimate property, and was intended to preserve peace and harmony among the states. I have seen, with inexpressible surprise and deep regret, that it has been contended not only that this conservative stipulation may be evaded, but that it is even meritorious to violate it. Meritorious to violate an express injunction of that constitution which many of us are solemnly sworn, and are all bound faithfully to support! If any citizens of the United States, who object to a particular part of the constitution, may elude and disregard it, other citizens, dissatisfied with other parts, have an equal right to violate them; and universal nullification of the saered instrument would be the necessary consequence.

I agree with you, gentlemen, in most of what you say in regard to the present condition of our public affairs. In contemplating it there is much to depress, but I rejoice much also to animate and encourage the genuine patriot, and to stimulate his most energetic exertions. New and alarming principles, dangerous practices, great abuses and extensive corruption have been introduced into the general administration, during the few last years. I have witnessed their progress, with profound regret and deep mortification. But sentiments of despair are never to be indulged as to the fortunes or fate of the republic. An enlightened and virtuous people require only to be convinced of the evil to apply an efficacious remedy; and this conviction is forcing itself upon them, in spite of all the efforts which have been made, and are making, to deceive and betray them.

I thank you, gentlemen, cordially, for the friendly and flattering manner in which you have executed the commission assigned to you by the whigs of Nansmond; and request you to be assured of the sentiments of esteem and regard, with which, I am, faithfully, your friend and ob^d serv^r,

DINNER TO MR. RIVES.

From the Richmond Whig.

It will be seen, from the following correspondence, that the hon. Wm. C. Rives accepts the invitation to partake of a dinner at Louisa Court House. We are requested to state that the dinner will take place on Saturday the 7th of September.

Louisa Court House, July 10th, 1839.

To the honorable Wm. C. Rives:
SIR: The undersigned, a committee appointed for and on behalf of many of the citizens of the county of Louisa, are requested to inform you of the high estimation in which they hold your recent independent course in the senate of the United States.

They have been much pleased to witness the firm and patriotic stand which you deemed it your duty to take, in opposition to the sub-treasury, which the undersigned regard as having no merit of its own, and nothing to recommend it to the adoption of the American people, save the executive will.—They do not regard it as less dangerous in 1839, than it was in 1834; but they regard it now as then, as a measure calculated to increase, to an alarming extent, the executive arm of our federal government, already too strong for a representative republic; to subject the public treasury to the pilferings of a hundred hands, where no one can now reach it; to create a better currency for the rulers, and a worse for the people; and they regard it as a measure, in perfect collision with the republican principles of '98 and '99, which ought to be cherished and sustained by every true disciple of the departed Madison and Jefferson.

The able opposition which you deemed it proper to make, against a measure so dangerous to the liberties and to the true interests of the country, entitles you to the most respectful gratitude and regard of all who are desirous to perpetuate our free institutions, and particularly to the gratitude and regard of the citizens of your native state, whom you have so long and so highly honored. We are aware that your hostility to the favorite measure of an administration with which you had so cordially co-operated, in carrying out constitutional and expeditious measures—of an administration too, which you honestly aided to elect, is by some ascribed to personal and interested motives; but when we consider that that hostility is against the favorite measure of an administration, by adhering to which you might reasonably expect personal preferment, we cannot otherwise be surprised that you should be actuated by motives of honesty, disinterestedness and patriotism, and which renders you worthy of a continuation of the confidence of your native state.

In consideration of your independent course, we are requested by many of your fellow-citizens of Louisa county, to tender you a public dinner, to be given at Louisa Court House, on Saturday, the 27th instant, or on such other day, as may better suit your convenience.

Castle Hill, July 15th, '39.

GENTLEMEN: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 9th instant, in which you inform me of your deputation as a committee, on behalf of many of my fellow citizens of the county of Louisa, to communicate to me "the high estimation in which they are pleased to hold my recent independent course in the senate of the U. States."

I need hardly say to you, gentlemen, that this spontaneous and generous expression of the approbation of my fellow citizens of the county of Louisa, is most grateful to my feelings. Happily, under our republican system, the sober and intelligent mass of the people unagitated by the violence of party passions, and unseduced by selfish or ambitious views, constitute the tribunal of last resort, to sit in judgment on the conduct of public men, and to decide every question of public concernment. However regardless I have been of the clamor of mere party denunciation, when it has been necessary to encounter it in the honest and conscientious discharge of my duty to my constituents and my country, I have never heard the real voice of the people, whether uttered in censure or in praise, but with sincere deference and respect. With this just sensibility to the opinion of the great body of my countrymen, the sentiments you have been commissioned to express to me in the name of many of my fellow citizens of Louisa—a country so long distinguished by the purity and soundness of its republican principles—could not but effect me with lively satisfaction, and call for my grateful acknowledgments.

In your condemnation of the sub-treasury scheme, and in your denunciation of the over-ruling grounds of objection to it, so forcibly stated by you, I entirely and heartily concur. A scheme more directly calculated to increase the executive power, by adding to its already enormous resources of patronage and influence, the uncontrolled possession of the public treasury—a project more fitly adapted to organize, in the hands of the government, a formidable moneyed power, which would speedily invest itself with the functions, and acquire the fearful predominance of a colossal treasury bank—a measure, in short, in all its aspects, more hostile to the public liberty, the public morals, and the public prosperity, or more vitally at war with the jealous republican principles of '98 and '99, (which ought to be peculiarly dear to Virginia), has never, in my humble judgment, been presented for the consideration of the American people. Such a measure, if adopted, were the views entertained of it by the whole republic only so far as was known), in 1834, when it was brought forward under other political auspices. Seeing no reason to think differently of the measure in 1837, when, to the great surprise of many of his friends, it was espoused and earnestly recommended by the present chief magistrate, I had no alternative, as an honest public servant, regarding the great interests of the country as paramount to every personal or party consideration, than to oppose it with unabated firmness.

This measure, so justly obnoxious to the objections you have stated in it, and so repeatedly and decisively repudiated by the solemn sense of the nation, is, (it seems), still to be pressed upon a reluctant people, until "they shall be fatigued into compliance"—a vexation, be it remembered, wrongs enumerated in the list of grievances and wrongs set forth in the Declaration of American Independence. The president himself has recently entered the field of political controversy in behalf of his favorite policy, and has announced that "the period is rapidly approaching" when all opposition to it, sustained now, as he says, only by "private interests and personal considerations," will unavoidably cease." By what "private interests and personal considerations" the chief magistrate supposes the great body of the American people to be actuated in their opposition to his cherished scheme, or by what appliances their opinions, founded on and matured by years of deliberate and careful reflection, are to be made, all at once, "unavoidably" to cease, I know not; but I am greatly mistaken in the spirit and character of my countrymen, if either executive dictation or executive denunciation, any more than executive blandishments, can prevail on them to surrender the honest convictions of their understandings to the requisition of private power. I think I may answer for you, gentlemen, that though most, if not all, of you were ardent supporters of the present election, no inducement of that sort can operate on you to abandon an opposition which, as freemen, it is your right, and as patriots, it is your duty, to make to every public measure which your judgments condemn; and for myself, honored by your generous confidence, I promise you that, whatever other "individual efforts may be discontinued, mine shall never cease to be exerted with all the humble ability I possess, in every lawful and proper mode, whether in private or public life, to frustrate a measure which, I believe with you, to be fraught with most imminent hazards to the liberty and happiness of our common country.

Your kind invitation to meet you and those of my fellow citizens whom you represent, at a public dinner to be given at Louisa Court House, I accept with pleasure; and understanding that some day the early part of September will be as convenient and agreeable to my friends as the day first suggested by you, while it will be more consistent with arrangements I had already made for an excursion of health and recreation, for some week with my family, I await your discretion in the designation of any day you may think proper to fix that month.

Accept, I pray you, gentlemen, for yourself and be pleased to convey to those of my fellow citizens of Louisa on whose behalf you act, with cordial acknowledgments for their kindness, these sentiments of sincere respect and esteem with which am their and your most obedient servant,

W. C. RIVES.

To Messrs. Pleasani Hackett, Joseph K. Pendlett, John R. Quarles, Nath. Mills, Wm. F. Johnson, Charles B. Hopkins, John Ellis, Bushrod W. Branham, Wm. M. Ambler, Daniel E. Hickman, committee, &c. &c.

REMARKS OF THE HON. C. J. INGERSOLL

From the Philadelphia Spirit of the Times.

The following remarks of the hon. Charles J. Ingersoll, delivered before the Harvest Home celebration yesterday, we like so well, placing the true light, as he has done, the relative situation of town and country, that we have given them, entire, our editorial columns, and ask for them from every reader, a calm and unprejudiced assent:

What is most worthy of notice at a harvest home just now, near the great town, as Penna call Philadelphia, is the striking contrast between town and country. As there, within sight of our fruitful metropolis, we are different people, in different moods, restrained by our ornament, and their severity, of the poet's saying that

"God made the country and man made the town. Only five miles from the exchange of Philadelphia, all about us is exultation and gratitude, bounties, while we can almost hear our neighbor in town, in the midst of peace, plenty and plenty, wailing gnashing and cursing at 10 times, tight days, bad markets and grievance which we are strangers to. Every thing that great producer, mother earth, affords, flourish this delightful season, in the utmost exuberance throughout our chosen land. Those who depend on harvest for happiness, and the banks of run streams for support, instead of banks of dice and their runners, are well to do, and grateful to a noble city, in all the just pride of its magnificence, with unequalled facilities, natural and artificial, for happiness and enjoyment crowded with intelligent and enterprising people, most of them respectable, moral and patriotic, yet so many in agonies of want and distress as to disturb the whole with uneasiness. Not a people; that is, not such as live on charity, but rich, depending on banks and living on pauperism, which is very hard diet. No pestilence, no war, or impoverishment; but with health, flourishing commerce, thriving manufactures, a good government, in short, all that is necessary for prosper, yet in real distress and bitter complaint. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, are now starving in Philadelphia; grimacing horrible ghastly faces daily dread of ruin. Why are the brethren of the town so well off, while their brethren of the town are miserable?—Sirs, because our fellow towns with all their superior learning, wisdom, and piety, suffer themselves to be governed, and play, suffer country to be disquieted by usurers, speculators, and extortioners who will not work, continually excite commotions, pressures and anxieties, by insane contrivances to make millions of rags, and fortunes in a day. Fatal experiments show that it cannot be done but that dreadful results inevitably follow their overstraining, and only to stimulate these jugglers to more desperate attempts to pass paper for silver, while the community submits to their abominations, does not applaud them. War, pestilence, or famine combined, would not inflict the wretched which towns, great and small, (for nearly every other wants or has it incorporated, that is, its largely stockaded and barricaded paper fort, its with privileged, intangible garisons to fire money from), suffer, and make others suffer, from these banditti. Despising the mother that bore them, our common mother, the earth, these necromancers having bolted the great riches by gambling in bye competency, hasten to get rich by gambling in bye ways. Our towns are overrun by them as much as those of some parts of Europe are by other sturdy beggars. New York is even more infested by them than Philadelphia. New York and Philadelphia are suffering from them as much as they did from the cholera. Numbers, vulgarly called gentlemen, are reduced to great straits, some of them to disgrace, by a town malaria which originated in original sin, and poisons the blood not only of individuals, but the whole community, producing an itch worse than the leprosy of old. Money or currency is the blood of the body politic. Derange it, and the whole system is disordered. All contrivances to make it out of other substances than all mankind have always used, that is, without precious metal and without labor, are absurd, and contrary to the laws of nature. You might as well undertake to make corn ripen in one cold winter night. The receipts of the government, by success in the paiping of paper on people for gold and silver, is as mere a cheat as wooden nutmegs, but much more injurious than that small fraud. It is the grand imposture of modern times, and the antidote of free government. Witchcraft is less foolish (and respectable Quakers have been hanged for it) than the slight of hand by which thousands of our poor deluded fellow townsmen are sold to the evil spirit by paper money. Witches are poor devils. But money mongers are terrible loco focos that go off by spontaneous combustion, and like burning prairies, consume all before them. Borrowing by bank discounts is the subtlest of seductions, the very worst of all ways of being led into temptation. Accommodation paper is millions gambling in millions. If one steals a cent, it is larceny; but if one hundred incorporated, cheat widows and orphans of all they have by paper money, they are privileged by law to do it, and go to church like gentlemen. It is wonderful how free and considerate the people are when it comes to such wrongs. The money mongers are at once suicides and fratricides. They destroy money, morals, law, order, industry, liberty, equality and property. They ruin the very standards of value. Where is the use of congress being empowered by the constitution to fix the standard of weights and measures, if every wild cat bank can unsettle it; make a yard four feet long or one as it pleases; a bushel hold a peck or a gallon; a pound weigh an ounce or two pounds? Gambling, habitual intoxication, betting on elections and other misdemeanors, are nothing to the monstrous vice and immorality. Police reports and insolvent courts are full of its perpetrators and victims—jails not as full as they might be. It is not the crazy instruments of the contrivance who are so much to blame, as the system itself, which is fatally false, and ought to be exposed. The best men in the world could not make it other than a very bad one. It is incredible how the few lead the many in this matter—how they pinch the poor and cheat the rich—the poor rich, too blind to see the hand which feeds them. The system is rotten to the core, narrow, bones and all, dishonest, unlawful, impracticable and ruinous.

When Robert Morris and Alexander Hamilton are vouched by some, and censured by others, as the author of modern banking, both parties wrong those great financiers. The bank of North America had dollars in coin, for dollars in paper, when Morris founded it, (as all banks have begun), as a temporary expedient. The notes of the first bank of the United States were always instantly convertible, when Hamilton made the first fatal experiment of taking bank notes for public dues. Neither of them ever countenanced such a thing as mere paper, nor convertible. The vile adulteration since grown up, is an American bastard, of British parentage; a stupendous fraud on mankind; a total overthrow of its intellect, and how the few lead the many in this matter—how they pinch the poor and cheat the rich—the poor rich, too blind to see the hand which feeds them. our national character, doing us immense injury abroad; a cancer in the American breast. It has reconized us to England. It forces tribute from us harder than we ever took up arms against. The holy alliance of despots regard it with delight as fettering beyond the combined power republican era of American development. It seems to be our doom. All science, experience, instinct teach that there is but one kind of money. But we half-informed Yankees, just too much educated to work, are put upon every device to live without it and with all our sharp-sightedness cannot perceive what every man, woman and child knows, that paper is not metal—perhaps there is something in the very trick of it that takes with Yankee. It is marvellous what a small number by this delusion confound and control the whole country.

These gamblers call themselves merchants, and rail at all endeavors to check their designs as injurious and inimical to commerce. The merchants ought to disown them. A bona fide merchant is an honor and benefit to any commonwealth. There were two such brothers whose summer residences were in Germantown; gentlemen who mingled their business with their pleasures, and comforted their community who were universally respected. But did they shave notes, fly exchange kites, stand trembling at a bank counter for the grinding of a bit of accommodation paper, or tear men's coats off to get stock in some new fancy, chartered to cheat? No, never. Merchants are not bulls nor bears, your jolbing jentry, who neither toil nor spin, yet are arrayed like Solomon in all his glory, and keep almost as many mistresses. There are hundreds of bank waiting men lounging about town, who in the country might be much more independent and respectable—and cured of dyspepsia and debt at the same time. If the real merchants would discountenance these counterfeiters, the lawyers would follow, and then the press, and so we should get rid of the dynasty, whose influence now is prodigious. I trust our young gentlemen will see that neither riches or honor come of discounts, debts, speculations, and fictitious credit. I always thought it a mistake in general Jackson to say that bank discounts and paper money were the ruin of the country. There are ten thousand blanks to one prize in that lottery. Look round through all the splendid misery of the flashy borrowers, where do you see a man grown even rich among them? Hundreds flatter about on paper wings, looking down with upstart contempt on honest thrift trudging along. But the end crowns the work. There is a French proverb which says—"we'll see when he dies." Industry never fails. Speculation seldom wins. The end of the speculators is commonly as hard as the way of transgressors. The jail or the poor-house is mostly his last stage. The flour speculators, the cotton speculators, the land speculators, and the stock speculators, the nabobs, the gilded butterflies of yesterday, are withered to crawling worms again to-day.

The bitter lessons they both learn and teach ought to satisfy us that time, as well as labor, are indispensable elements in all solid acquirements; that discounts are no property, nor paper gold. The country with his dirty acres, is richer than the tradesman on paper pinions. None get rich by gambling, and a few in a hurry. If the old Roman had put a little Greek into his veto, he would have argued that, while paper money does indeed grind the poor, yet it seldom makes the rich richer. The rich lose more, though they may sniffer less by it than the poor. It is the great, if not the only cause of the striking difference existing between the towns and the farms of our common country; and if country people could but unite against the disorganizers, as they greatly outnumber them, they could put them down with ease at once.

There is one and only one simple cure for the evil, and that is no paper money under, at any rate, twenty dollars. There is gold and silver enough in the country if the banks would let it circulate. If the superior enterprise more constant, and more universal labor of the United States were not sold, the country with its certain standard of value, that by which all other nations measure for themselves and for us too, domestic exchanges would be equal, and foreign exchanges in our favor against all parts of the world. Europe would be constantly in debt to us; and we should export our manufactures to Europe, Asia and Africa. All other protection to American industry is futile but payments in gold and silver. They are the only American system; a tariff without them is nonsense. There is not time now to develop a political view of this subject, which may be rendered very striking, especially to young men: I mean the aristocratic effect of paper money.

It is common to talk of an aristocracy of wealth; but as, in my humble opinion, gambling on credit seldom, if ever, leads to wealth, his wish wrong to call the waking up of aristocracy it raises from all sorts to wealth upright, an aristocracy of wealth, for they have no wealth. Instead of presenting a view of this part of the subject now, however, I must leave that tail of aristocracy for some future exposition, and close at present by one practical and personal illustration. There was a poor village boy, of humble parents, who managed, as he grew up, by good conduct to work his way along, till he saved some money, earned by practising as a lawyer. He resisted the temptation of speculation, though it was rife all about him, and stuck to his business. While his acquaintances were most of them all agog for making money by banks and other corporations, and burning their fingers with discounts to get rich in a day, he preferred investing his gains in land, and letting it lie like seed to ripen and bear fruit. By such investment, as often happens, he grew rich, so rich that he said he was ashamed for thinking so much of it. His neighbors finding him too worthy, called him into public service, in the state legislature, and gradually rose from one place to another, till he became such a public man, that crowds of people welcomed him, like Lafayette, wherever he went, and especially country people. Some say he drives a gilded coach, with servants in fine liveries, which, if so, is not like his taste generally; though probably it is a handsome equipage, as he has become president of the United States, supplied by law with liberal means to maintain the dignity of that elevated station.

From his career, avarice and ambition may learn a moral. His administration is striving against the paper power, which Washington and Madison, and the other fathers of our present government flattered themselves they had put down. In the course of human events, however, it afterwards stole a terrible march upon us; and, let us confess, not with too much democratic assistance. President Jackson, God bless him! came with his iron nerve and head of granite, heated in a volcano, to set his foot on the popularian, and to set his noble back against the loc of New Orleans—his paper money foe denounced by Madison, the Federalist as worse than enemies in arms—more formidable to American liberty and equality, morality and property, union and harmony. President Van Buren, in his calm, considerate way, has set himself against it too. The speculators say he wants to injure trade and break the banks. But just the contrary: he is sustaining them against counterfeiters. He says to the banks: "Gentlemen, I wish you no harm; but I think, after so many experiments, equally injurious to you and to government, you ought not to use public money, which the law punishes as delinquency when done by individuals. You may use what kind of money you like; but the law and the constitution requires gold and silver for public dues." This is the whole question which agitates the country. The speculators are like a disturbed hornet's nest—all lury and spite. But who ever attacked them? Who made the banks burst? Not government. Who made the shiving shops in towns go off like blasted rocks? Was it not themselves who drilled the holes and used the gunpowder? They must and will use usury—it must be in paper money—it must be borrowed money—it must be public money—and it must be kept in chartered corporations. The president mildly, if not meekly, says not. Having preserved his own chastity of pocket from miscellaneous intercourse, he desires to restore that of government, which, by one false step after another, since general Hamilton's first flirt with a bank, had got, at last, to downright polygamy, and was half ruined by keeping a whole harem of these mistresses. It is a hard task, to be sure, to reform a confirmed rake; but is not the president in duty bound to try and restore the constitution to its original vigour? I think he will succeed—he is so lucky, and the thing is so very reasonable. He got the better of the British when they teased the Maine lacs. Fine fellows those to mind. There is so much to be learned from their madnes! Congress, by proclamation, all parties, voted Martin Van Buren dictator of all North America, though a bold stroke, was a glorious spectacle of republican might. It told in London and Paris like the capture of Saratoga, Yorktown and New Orleans. These peaceable victories are excellent things for cheap government, such as the U. States have lately won over the two greatest powers of Europe. It is really doing wonders, by mere dread of democracy, without fleets and armies. If such exploits are followed up by an act of emancipation from the money power, the United States, with seventeen millions of people, will fulfil the destiny marked out by their great declarator of independence, and low and country will prosper altogether.

CHRONICLE.

Wilmington whalers. In our last we mentioned the arrival at Wilmington, of the whaling ship North America. The Delaware Journal states that she was out about fourteen months—and about nine of these were passed in going to and coming from her fishing grounds—leaving about five months for employment in actual fishing. She brought in about 2,300 barrels, about 60 or 70 of which are sperm. She disposed of fifteen hundred dollars worth at Hobart's-town, the cash for which she brought with her—and afterwards filled the vacancy occasioned in her hold by taking more whales. She has on board about 20,000 lbs. of bones. The voyage is extraordinary fine, and speaks for itself as to knowledge, experience and activity of the captain and crew, and while it is profitable to the company, will inspire new hope and animation in those engaged in this excellent enterprise.

Serious casualty. We learn that the train of burden cars, loaded with cotton for the Laurel factory, on the Patuxent, took fire yesterday from the sparks of the locomotive engine, on the Washington rail road, and that about forty bales of cotton were consumed. The loss sustained in consequence of this accident, is estimated at about three thousand dollars. Experience seems to have demonstrated that, while the moving power of the engines in use upon rail roads is generated by the combustion of wood as fuel, it is exceedingly difficult to avoid an occasional accident by fire upon the line of the road. This being assumed, as it can hardly be controverted, the greater safety—we might almost say the more prudent—mode for the purpose, ought to be a strong recommendation to the latter, and to secure it the preference in all cases, so far as practicable. [Balt. Patriot.

Steamboat accident. The Rochester Democrat states that on the evening of the 9th instant, as the steamboat United States was going out of port, she encountered the Great Britain, or the two boats struck each other, by which both were very much injured. A large break was made in the U. States, and the Great Britain lost most of her deck—much of her masts were entirely bare. The United States immediately returned to make repairs, and after a short time again put out, but after going about forty miles, she was obliged to return on account of a great leakage and a strong head wind.

Large claim. On Saturday last a deed was shown us, dated several years before the treaty of William Penn with the Indians. The deed secures many thousand acres of land in New Jersey to the holder of it and his heirs. A few days ago one of the heirs ascertained that this deed was in the possession of a particular who, at the conflagration of the recorder's office, about 50 years ago, probably saved and retained it. The heir immediately called upon him, demanded and obtained it. Suits, we understand, will shortly be instituted for this land by the claimant, who is a shoemaker by profession. Several counties in the state of New Jersey are included in this claim. [Phil Ledg.

An effective blow. A young man in Middletown valley a short time since killed a garter snake with the extraordinary number of one hundred and two young snakes in embryo. This is no snake story. [Frederick Examiner.

Large cocoonery. The editor of the Philadelphia United States Gazette gives an account of a visit to the Highfield cocoonery, near Philadelphia, owned by Philip Physic, esq. The building is one hundred and twenty feet long and thirty feet wide, three stories high. The basement contains a steam engine for propelling machinery, a repository for mulberry leaves, where they are kept dry without withering, and an apartment for culinary purposes. In the upper stories, there are the hatching room in which thirty-five thousand silk worms were hatched in one morning, and the feeding room, in which the spinning was done, an immense room supplied with shelves, ladders, galleries, ranges of shelves on railways, and locomotive steps for reaching the different burlards. In this room there were about a million of four hundred thousand worms. Near the building was growing four hundred thousand mulcaulis trees. On the top of the house was a reservoir of water, from which pipes descended to every room. The water is pumped from a well in the yard and conveyed to the house top, a distance of sixty-three feet, by dog power.

Not so fast. Mr. Buckingham, the editor of the Boston Courier, and one of the officers of the Bunker Hill monument association, states that if twenty thousand dollars have been subscribed towards the completion of the Bunker's Hill monument, the directors know nothing about it.

The Turkish law against duelling is very severe. The survivor in a duel which took place in Constantinople, was found guilty of murder and decapitated. The parties were rival lovers.

The two hundred anniversary of the landing of the first Uraline nurse who settled in Canada, and also of the sisters of the Hotel Dieu, was celebrated at Quebec on the 18th ultimo. The founders of these institutions were the daughters of Anahide, Madame de La Force, to whom and their ancestors, the poor of Canada are much indebted.

State loan. We learn that the banks which some time since made a temporary loan to the state have converted it into a permanent one, thus relieving the state from the embarrassment which its failure to obtain it from other sources might have occasioned. [Phil. North Am.

The governor of Florida has made arrangements with the Union bank for a loan on the bonds of the territory for a sum sufficient to purchase arms, provisions, &c. and the maintenance of a territorial force independent of the United States for the protection of the frontier. An application for arms and provisions made by the governor to col. Davenport, commanding United States forces, was refused.

Frontier Indians. In November, 1838, it was estimated that the number of emigrate Indians west of the Mississippi amounted to 11,652. Of the indigenous tribes, the commissioner of Indian affairs reported 231,866 as within striking distance of the western frontier. The whole number of removed and native tribes to the west of Missouri and Arkansas is 312,585. Of these it is officially estimated that every fifth individual is a warrior; constituting a force of 62,577 warriors.

Of the Indians remaining to the east of the Mississippi in November, and under treaty stipulations to remove, there were 26,452. [N. Y. Courier.

Copper mine in Essex county, N. J. There has been opened, within a few weeks, a copper mine in the neighboring town of Topshfield, in this county. It is in the southwest side of the town, near the Danvers and Middleton lines. It promises this far, we understand to yield a good quantity and quality of this metal. [Salem Advocate.

New type metal. The Foreign Monthly Review says that a Mr. Colson, type founder, of Clermont, England, has obtained a patent for making types from a new composition, much harder than that in common use. Types made from it will last ten years, even under stress printing.

Liberation of prisoners. A letter received at Rochester from Kingston, (U. C.) states that the lieutenant governor has pardoned the following persons, taken prisoners at Windmill last fall, and sent them to the U. States at the expense of the British government. Nine are Americans and two Frenchmen. Oliver Lawton, Auburn—Samuel Livingston, Lisbon—Edgar Rogers, Watertown—John M. Jones, Philadelphia, Jefferson county—Gaines Powers, Dexter—John Graves, Grand Island—James D. Delahed, Oswego—Levi Chapman, Morris-town—Thomas Chipman, Rouses Point—Raza, Montreal—Alonzo Mayott, Rousseau, St. Lawrence county. It is believed that all the prisoners in the fort, amounting to 70, will be liberated soon, provided no disturbance occur on the frontier.

John David Fink has been recognized by the president of the United States, as consul of Wurttemberg for the port of New Orleans, and for the state of Mississippi, Alabama and the territory of Florida; and Frederick Frey as consul of Baden, for the port of New Orleans.

New cotton. New Orleans August 6. The steamboat Arabion, from Louisville which she left on the 27th ult. brought down six bales of the new crop from Rodney. We have understood that five bales were sold on landing at 15 cents per pound. The quality is good fair.

Accident. As the steamboat Maceppa was proceeding towards Madisonville, on Sunday last, with several passengers on board, one of the young men engaged to row one of the boats during the race went into the water, cabin to change his dress. While there, he carelessly and unguardedly threw a light segar into a small keg or barrel standing near, but, on turning round and perceiving that the keg contained gun-powder, he stooped for the purpose of removing the segar, when an explosion took place, by which the young man was very severely scorched and wounded, the cabin blown to atoms, and a greater confusion and alarm caused among all on board. We understand that the individual, though seriously injured, is likely to recover.

Steamboat sunk. The steamboat Empress, Russell, from St. Louis, reports the loss of the steamboat Cassell, sunk at Montt Vernon. Also, the steamboat Sultan, snagged and sunk in 10 feet water at head of No. 8, on the 29th of July. The boat and cargo a total loss. [Bee.

Churches in Virginia. We gather from an editorial article in the Religious Herald, the following statistics in respect to the number of communicants in the churches of the principal Christian denominations in Virginia.

In the Baptist churches,	60,000 communicants.
Methodist Episcopal church,	50,000 do.
Methodist Episcopal church,	3,750 do.
Presbyterian church,	12,000 do.

The United States court at Boston have decided that a claim by seamen for wages after a vessel is progressing unseaworthy, is not tenable.

Audubon's ornithology. The Boston Atlas, in stating that the last chapter in this stupendous work has been completed, remarks—This conclusion has been attained of an undertaking, which, unrivalled for the boldness almost amounting to temerity with which it was commenced, the perseverance and untiring zeal with which it was carried on, and the fidelity, industry, and activity which have been completed, will remain an enduring monument of American enterprise and science.

A company has just been organized at Richmond, for the construction of a rail road, three miles in length, which will commence the transportation of all the coal raised at the Etna mines, the Dupuy and Poval mines, and others about to be worked, about one-third of the road is already graded, and will be ironed in a few weeks, so that profits may be expected the present year.

Steam ships to Boston. The Boston Transcript states that the Atlantic steam navigation company have accepted the proposals of the East Boston company to build a wharf near the ferry, for the express accommodation of Mr. Cunard, with ample docks for the reception of his five steam ships, and an extensive depot for coal, and to tender him a lease of it for twenty years, without any charge except the customary wharfage and goods shipped and landed. Also, to carry all merchandise to consignees, and from the shippers without any charge for ferrage, and at the city rates for truckage; so that it may be transported as cheap as if landed or shipped on the Boston side.

Yellow fever in New Orleans. The Bee of the 3d, says—"We have made careful enquiry at the sources where accurate information is most likely to be obtained, and we are justified in concluding that yellow fever does exist in our city. In the charity hospital several fatal cases have occurred, and there are now several patients lying in the disease. Some cases have broken out in the city. We know of two young men, merchant's clerks, who are now down with the fever. As yet, however, the epidemic prevails to no very alarming extent; but the intense heats which have succeeded the long continued and copious rains, it is altogether probable, that in a few days, we shall be obliged to record new cases, and to exercise the greatest caution, so that they remain among us to be exceedingly cautious in their habits, and to avoid exposure to the dews of the morning and evening, and if possible, to the unmitigated fierceness of the sun's rays at mid-day.

Extra sessions of congress. Since the adoption of the constitution, congress has been convened four times on extraordinary occasions, to wit: in 1797, by John Adams, on matters relating to the war with France; in 1809 and 1812, by James Madison, on matters relating to the war with Great Britain; and in 1837, by Martin Van Buren, on account of the war against the banks and commercial credit of the country. An historical anecdote. It is said that some months before the eccentric and brutal Paul, czar of Russia, was murdered by his subjects in his palace, he gave his eldest son, Alexander, leave to ask any favor he thought proper, promising to accord it to him. The young archduke, begging that his father would not be offended, thus nobly expressed himself:—"I request, sire, that any verbal order or writ any subject may have occasioned, and that executed at any time, twenty hours shall have elapsed." This was a severe rebuke to the tyrant, whose caprice, ill-temper and unjust acts are matters of history. Nevertheless, he granted the bold request of his son, and confirmed it by proclamation.

The Huntsville Democrat estimates the loss on cotton, this year, to the people above the Muscle shoals, in the Tennessee valley, caused by the delay in getting the article into market before the decline in prices, at from $200,000 to $500,000.

Longevity. There are now living in Nantucket 57 persons whose individual ages number almost as many years as have elapsed since the world began! The ages of these 57 individuals amount to an aggregate of 4,204 years. The eldest is a female of 97—the youngest, of whom there are five, are over fourscore each; average of the whole upwards of 84 years; males 24, females 36.

Commerce of Baltimore. We learn that twenty-nine ships and brigs are now on their way from Europe to Baltimore, some of which are hourly expected. Of this number two are from London; six from Liverpool; and twenty-one from Bremen. [Balt. Amer.

The Mermons. Some disciples of John Smith have established themselves in the neighborhood of New Egypt, and in other places, in Monmouth, N. J. They first appeared there some six months ago. They have made converts of several persons of some standing and influence; and strange as the story seems, their numbers are increasing. [New Jersey State Gazette.

Destructive fire. A disastrous fire broke out in Cincinnati on the morning of the 3d instant, in an oil mill, and the flames were not arrested until six o'clock. Two flouring mills, one corn, do. one linseed, do. one casting oil, do. one large frame warehouse, and two dwelling houses. The whole amount of property destroyed is estimated at about forty thousand dollars, of which amount only about twenty thousand dollars were insured. A son of Mr. Bryan, owner of the mill, a young man of 17 years of age, was burnt in the building.

THE PAST—THE PRESENT—FOR THE FUTURE.

PRINTED AND PUBLISHED, EVERY SATURDAY, BY WILLIAM OGDEN NILES, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR, AT $5 PER ANNUM, PAYABLE IN ADVANCE.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE PRESIDENT. Henry Lydard, to be secretary of the legation of the United States at Paris.
John A. Parker, of Virginia, to be clerk to the commissioner for marking the boundary between the United States and the republic of Texas.

The president has officially recognized Thomas Colley Grattan, as British consul for the state of Massachusetts, to reside at Boston.

NEAPOLITAN INDEMNITY. The secretary of the treasury has given notice that the sixth instalment of the Neapolitan indemnity, amounting, as is now computed, to $220,416 47, will be paid to the claimants on application to the Bank of America at New York, on or after the 5th day of September next, and at such other places as that bank may designate.

THE FOREIGN NEWS received by the packet ship Liverpool, and published in the present sheet, has caused much speculation in the commercial community; but it is considered too vague to form the basis of any calculations for the future, as every thing depends upon the state of the crops. The New York Express of Monday says, those interested in keeping down stocks, are clamorous that the accounts are bad, and it appears to have that effect on stocks, which have declined from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 per cent. The cotton holders are quite encouraged, and ask higher rates. Both opinions are in part correct.

Private advices give a more favorable account of trade—particularly in American goods, and there is certainly a good advance on cotton—full a halfpenny, with a speculating spirit. This is calculated to help the staple. The prospects are thought to be unfavorable to grain and also for money—for, as the Bank of England has obtained no relief, it was unable to afford relief to others. Indeed, its ability was not as great as that of the private bankers, who discounted paper at less rates than the bank. As there is no relief in American stocks, with the exception of one or two, the effect upon stocks has been unfavorable in Wall street.

Our people are always ready whenever there is the least chance for speculation. The news is considered so unfavorable for the crops in England, that quite an active movement has been made here in the flour market. At an early hour the spirit made its appearance, and considerable sales have been made at 25 cents advance.

The Philadelphia North American says the news is certainly as good as we could have anticipated. Every thing there now depends on the coming harvest, and the closing advices on that point were to be considered as favorable. The export of bullion continued when the Liverpool sailed, but the arrival of the steamers from this country, carrying out over a million of dollars, will serve to allay their fears in relation to any alarm from this country, and the anticipated arrivals of large amounts from Mexico will tend to give steadiness to the market. We could not have expected a very great change in so short a time as to find the English market relieved.

The difficulty of exchanges still continues with us, and is aggravated, we are informed, by western men confounding the published rates at which exchange will be collected here, with those at which it will be cashed. As, for instance, exchange on New Orleans will be collected at 3 a 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. but will not be cashed under 6, and sometimes it is difficult to have it done at any price.

MEXICO. The schooner G. Wether, at New Orleans, sailed from Tampico on the 31st July. She brings $125,000 in specie.

Letters from Tampico of July 30 state that the country is perfectly tranquil. Bustamante has resumed the presidential chair, and Santa Ana has retired to his farm of Manga al Clavo.

The custom house officers exhibit the utmost rigor towards trade.

The hon. F. H. Elmore, a member of congress from South Carolina, has resigned his seat in that body.

Mr. Zebadee Kendall, father of the postmaster general, died at his residence in Dunstable, Mass. on Wednesday, aged 94 years.

EXCITEMENT IN BALTIMORE. Great excitement was occasioned in Baltimore on Sunday last, in consequence of the escape of a nun from the Carmelite nunnery, in Aisquith st., who took refuge in a neighboring house, and was from thence conveyed to the hospital department of the Washington medical college, by the mayor of the city, who had been called upon during the excitement occasioned by the event. In consequence of the exaggerated rumors which had arisen, it was feared by some that an attempt would be made during the night to destroy the nunnery,—for a large crowd had collected in the afternoon, and there were some indications of a riotous spirit. But the mayor, with that promptitude and energy for which he is so justly distinguished, called upon the regiment of city guards, which promptly repaired to the vicinity of the spot, and held themselves in readiness to act on the first emergency. Their presence, and a proper disposition of the police, completely over-awed all who were disposed for mischief, and the night passed away quietly. Since that period the excitement has entirely ceased, but the guards were on duty several successive nights, and are now prepared to act at a moment's warning.

It is due to the character of Baltimore to say, that one hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand of her citizens, discountenanced the mad and senseless clamor by which a few fanatics endeavored to excite the bigoted or ignorant in the crowd, and that the slightest movement of a hostile character, even without the presence of the guards, would have been instantly suppressed.

The following certificates establish the insanity of the nun whose escape occasioned the excitement, beyond the shadow of doubt.

Having read in yesterday evening's Post "that it was the opinion of the faculty of the Washington college that Miss Isabella Neale," the apparent cause of the present excitement, "was sane," I deem it my duty to the faculty to state that they have expressed no opinion on the case. As regards my own individual opinion, I am free to say that I consider her a perverse maniac.

J. H. MILLER, M. D. president of the faculty of Washington university of Baltimore.
Baltimore, August 20, 1839.

The Carmelite sister who left the convent yesterday, (Sunday), whose name is Isabella Neale, has been to my knowledge afflicted with this monomania for upwards of five months. She thinks she can live without eating and drinking. As I have not seen her since April last, she may now be better on that point; but, for all, my opinion is, she never will be in her right senses.

P. CHATARD, M. D.
Baltimore, August 19, 1839.

We the undersigned, members of the faculty of medicine of the Washington university of Baltimore, having been applied to by col. Wm. Brent for our opinion in relation to the case of sister Isabella, who was placed in this institution by the mayor of the city on Sunday last, state as follows:

That we have visited her several times, and from the general tenor of her conversation, we are clearly of opinion that she is not of sane mind, there is general feebleness of intellect, and we are unanimous in the belief that she is a monomaniac. We also feel it an act of justice to state that she made no complaint of her treatment while in the convent, other than having been compelled to take food and medicine.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE LOAN. The Philadelphia North American says that the banks of that city, which some time since made a temporary loan to the state, have converted it into a permanent one; thus relieving the state from the embarrassment which its failure to obtain it from other sources might have occasioned.

ABOLITION CONVENTION. The following resolutions were adopted by the recent abolition convention at Albany:

1. Resolved, That we will neither vote for nor support the election of any man for president or vice president of the United States, or for governor or lieutenant governor, or for any legislative office, who is not in favor of the immediate abolition of slavery.

2. Resolved, That every abolitionist who has a right to vote be earnestly entreated to lose no opportunity to carry his abolition principles to the polls, and thereby cause our petitions to be heard through the medium of the ballot-box.

HEALTH OF CHARLESTON. The Charleston Patriot of Wednesday gives a statement of the deaths in that city for the week ending the 11th inst. There were 12 deaths by stranger's fever, during the week, and 22 by all other diseases—making 36 in all; of which 25 were white and 11 black and colored persons. The 12 fatal cases of stranger's fever, during the week, were all of white persons.

The yellow fever still prevails in New Orleans. The Courier says—It does not, in most cases, yield to the remedies that were used with success in 1837. Candidly speaking, we believe the yellow fever is destined to afford now and hereafter, as it has done formerly, cause of wonder as to the inefficiency of medical skill, whenever it seriously attacks people whose blood and habits are foreign to warm climates.

Since the report from the hospital of the 3d, there have been, according to a statement in the Bulletin, 25 deaths—8 of which occurred in one day.

An injunction has been laid by the Massachusetts bank commissioners, upon the Middle Interest Bank at Boston. This bank, according to the Mercantile Journal, "has a very large circulation, and it is amongst those least able to lose; but it is believed that the bills will be redeemed." The following card has been put forth by the president.

Middle Interest Bank, Boston, Aug. 3, 1839.—To the public.—The Suffolk bank, by its president, Mr. Stone, has seen fit in the plenitude of his power, to reject at his counter, the bills of this bank, and the bank commissioners, by his dictation, have believed it their duty to put an injunction upon any further operations of this institution. This bank has an account with the Suffolk bank, having a large deposit, and at no time, as I believe, has this bank been indebted to the Suffolk bank, since the opening of its account with it, to the amount of a dollar. The purpose of this note is to say to the public, that every bill bearing my name and that of the cashier, shall be paid, dollar for dollar. I say to Mr. Stone, and to the associated banks, under his control, for he seems to be the great bank dictator, that he and they shall hear from me as I may find leisure, in the columns of the Morning Post, if my friend, the editor, who never yet refused me a favor, can find a column or two. In the meantime I owe it to the bank to say that the names of their debtors—and that their concerns are very freely communicated by some of the bank commissioners in a manner altogether inconsistent with the spirit and intent of the bank law which gives them power—and the debts of the merchants of Boston, are very well known to the public, by virtue of the inquisitorial powers of the bank commissioners.

JOHN M. FISKE, president.

The capital of the Middling Interest Bank is, or was, $150,000.

FLORIDA. The following letter, received at Key West, and thence forwarded to Philadelphia, contains additional particulars respecting the late horrible attack of the Indians on col. Harney's post. We copy it from the North American:

Sinibal, (Florida), July 22, 1839.

The sloop Jane, from Tampico, arrived at the mouth of Sinibal river late in the evening, while the tide was running out. We were unable to proceed to the encampment, which was situated about 8 miles up the river. We proceeded, however, early next morning, and got about 5 miles up, when we met a sloop with 7 or 8 men in her, and perceived that something was wrong, as the men in said boat were some bald naked and others with their heads bound up. Their cry was, "for God's sake turn back, for col. Harney and all the men are wounded."

The savages had surprised the poor fellows at a time when least expected—just before the dawn of day. Some were still while lying in their beds; the men had not even time to seize their rifles. Those who escaped, ran for the river and swam off to a sloop—(the one that we met). The first sergeant was wounded before reaching the river. An Indian from the bank entreated him to turn back and bring his men with him, and they would not hurt him; he foolishly turned back, and two or three others followed his advice—they were led away by the Indians and were afterwards shot.

After turning back with said sloop, we stopped at the mouth of the river, and perceived a canoe running down, which we at first took for Indians; but, judge our surprise to find col. Harney and a soldier, who, during the murder, had taken to the wood on the bank of the river, and there found the canoe, and succeeded in making their escape. The first word from the colonel was how many men had escaped, and how many rifles had we left, which upon examination we found to be three.

The gallant colonel immediately determined on going back, as, in all probability, some of the men had escaped, and were yet on the banks of the river. It was a very hazardous expedition to proceed 8 miles up a river lined with Indians, and only two or three rifles to protect ourselves. The men muffled their oars, so as to make as little noise as possible, and started at about 11 o'clock at night. They got to the camp just before daylight; and, after crawling up the bank, the first thing that met their view was the body of one of their comrades, mangled in a most shocking manner—scalped, and his entrails taken out.

They proceeded a little further, and found some six or seven in the same situation. Judging it not prudent to remain long, they seized on what few things the Indians had left, which were three kegs of pickles, a bag of corn, and some coffee, and returned to the sloop. The colonel dispatched one sloop to Tampa, with two men that were wounded, and with our boat we proceeded for Cape Florida. The first day we were fired upon by Cape Florida, about fifty miles from the Sinibal, but we were too far from the land for the shot to take any effect.

On the 27th we arrived at Cape Sable, and fell in with the schooner Charles Howe, which we hired to go to Cape Florida, to put what few troops are there on their guard. I put into Key Vacas, which gives me this opportunity of relating the news. The number of soldiers stationed at Sinibal was 25, a sutler and his clerk, and two men employed as laborers; the number missing is 13 soldiers, the sutler and his clerk, and the two men employed as laborers, and one man employed as pilot.

The sutler's name is Dallow, the clerks name Morgan, the carpenter's name is Howard, the pilot's name H. McCarty; soldiers names not known—13 in all.

The Indians have got considerable boats. The sutler had an assortment of goods worth about 2 or $3,000, and about $1,000 in specie. The soldiers had 14 patent rifles, 6 carbines, 1 keg powder, a number of percussion caps, and a great quantity of private property belonging to col. Harney and soldiers. They had placed every confidence in the Indians. They would come into camp every day and talk with the men, and when asked if they were satisfied with the treaty, answered they were.

A letter from a gentleman at Tampa Bay furnishes the following statement of the killed, wounded and missing, at the attack made on col. Harney's post in Florida, by the Indians on the 23d ult.

A correspondent of the National Gazette, who dates from Carey's Ferry, (E Florida), August 7th, gives the following additional particulars of the late treacherous and cruel massacre by the Indians of a party of soldiers with whom they had been in daily habits of professed friendship:

"Shortly after dark, on the 23th July, four dragoons, two wounded, arrived here in a fishing smack from the Caloosahatchee, and reported the massacre of the largest portion of col. Harney's command of 27th dragoons, that went, about four weeks since, to establish a trading house, in conformity with Macomb's treaty. The circumstances of this cold-blooded and unprovoked act of hostility are thus related by the men: The Indians had for some time manifested the most friendly disposition; they daily visited col. Harney's camp, and traded with Mr. Dallow, the sutler. So completely had the Indians lulled them into security, that col. Harney did not expect the least defence, nor take the means to guard against surprise or treachery. The dragoons were encamped in the open pine woods, on the margin of the river. At the dawn of day of the 23d July, the enemy made a simultaneous attack on the encampment and the trading house, 300 yards distant, which was guarded by five more persons belonging to the establishment. Those who escaped the first discharge fled to the river, naked, and by wading and swimming succeeded in reaching some fishing smacks that were anchored near its mouth. Col. Harney, being aroused by the firing and yelling opened his tent, and found himself surrounded by the Indians, and some of his men in the river. He immediately sought a small canoe, which lay a short distance up the river, in which he and one man escaped. The sergeant and four others, while swimming down the river, were called to the shore by an Indian known as Billy Bowlegs, (a son of old Bowlegs, who was the military chief of the Seminoles in 1818, and grandson of Cowkeeper, a distinguished chief in the nation prior to 1815), who speaks English perfectly, and invited to the shore, under the assurance they should not be harmed; they complied, and were instantly butchered. In the afternoon, col. Harney was joined by another man, and they cautiously approached the scene of slaughter, in hopes of finding that some of the party had escaped by concealment. Eleven bodies were found, horribly mutilated, and the Indians were distinctly heard dancing and whooping on the opposite side of the river, where they had been encamped, numbering about 250. The fate of Messrs. Dallow and Morgan, the sutlers, is not positively known, but no doubt exists that they were both murdered, as they were sleeping under a vine porch in the rear of their storehouse. Eighteen were killed, thirteen of whom were of the second dragoons, and the choicest men of that corps. They were especially selected by col. Harney for this service, on account of their expertness with Colt's patent many-chambered rifle, with which they were armed."

MEXICO. In addition to the news from Mexico published in our last, we find in New Orleans papers since received, the following message from gen. Santa Ana to the Mexican legislature.

Message from his excellency the president ad interim, general Don Antonio Lopez de Santa Ana, read at the solemn opening of the 2d session of the national congress on the 1st of July, 1839.

This day commences an interesting period in our sittings—the moment when the constitution submits you to a general examination of accounts of the year, in order that you may, if possible, establish a level between the receipts and expenditures, a balance between the wants of the nation and the taxes to be paid by the people. As your labors will begin under the favorable auspices of peace, now happily re-established, although at most cost, you will be able to advance without inquietude or disturbance along the path traced out to the legislator; giving preference to a definitive settlement of the finances, on which are based the life and real existence of nations.

Unable to lose sight of that which the present situation of the republic so imperiously call for, you will inquire if the moment has not now inevitably arrived for reforming the institutions of 1836. For the government the question is already answered; not only because public opinion has been pronounced in an unequivocal manner, but because it has been found by experience, while entrusted with the highest powers of the state, how insufficient are the means which the constitution provides for assuring the repose, the permanent happiness, the order, and the aggrandizement of the nation. I have in consequence commanded that a suitable plan of reform be laid before you—you will thus be called on to consider the reasons that have determined the executive, and which he now manifests with that frankness and loyalty that constitute his device in every act of his administration.

I have condemned and fought against the anarchical disorganizing principles of those who usurping the august name of the nation, pretended to give it laws, while they submitted to their own caprice and annulled by open force the existing constitution. The nation adopted the representative system, to stifle at their birth, revolutions, risings and tumults, and in order that its lawful agents might freely decide all vital questions, in the best and most convenient way, without the risk of leaving them with turbulent and unprincipled demagogues. But, when remedies are pointed out in fundamental laws, for a wretchedly in which the nation may find itself, the true principles of government, and once derives safety therefrom without other aid, and the people are saved from the necessity of contending former compacts, or of destroying a work susceptible of being amended and rectified.

There is always a time for examining a work, and for seeking and adopting the most perfect. In this age of progress, when some social wants are giving place to others, the statesman cannot steer the ship of state without having the sound at hand, to enable him to avoid the danger of hidden shoals. In this same age, when our social customs are changing with inconceivable rapidity, and the impetus to revolution is no less violent in our political institutions, there is no other known means for avoiding the consequences of imprudence, but the permanent existence of congressional legislators, who can, by keeping up with the times, do away with the lamentable necessity of leaving the people to progress as they think proper.

Now then the force of the laws has been substituted for that of factions, I can, citizen legislators, confide to you a task of difficulty and responsibility, that of amending some of those faults, which abound in the conceptions of man. Painful and great is the undertaking; but Providence has thought oper to confide to your care the dearest interests of the nation. The latter will respect your declining; and in the mean time my government shall assure to you, entire liberty, and free and sincere evidence.

Representatives of the nation! I have told you in which honor and conscience dictated. May it respond with the favor of the people, and serve its wishes.

ANTONIA LOPEZ DE SANTA ANA. Mexico, July 1, 1839.

CARAVANS FROM MEXICO. The caravans for present will be the explorers of the beautiful territory between the Gulf of Mexico and that of California. Texian arms and Texian cities will, at a very distant day, glitter on the shores of the Pacific, spreading far and wide the blessings of Anglo Saxon religion and civilization, more precious than mines of gold.

The New Orleans Louisiana gives a highly interesting account of the tour of the late caravan came from the interior of Mexico, by the Red river, to New Orleans. The party was composed of distinguished Mexicans, and some Americans from Chihuahua. The former brought with them a large amount of gold bullion, and their caravan consisted of five hundred mules, ten wagons, a guard of one hundred men. The chiefs of the party led the main body at Pecan Point, the place on Red River. They met with no motion or interference whatever, in their route of a hundred miles, over a beautiful rolling prairie, interspersed with clusters of large trees, an abundance of fine springs and pellucid water courses, being passed above the heads of rivers flowing into the Gulf of Mexico. When they set out they expected attacks from the Indians on their journey but they met with no human being, until they passed over the head waters of Red river, where they mistook for those of the Brazos. Nor their mistake discovered until they struck the Rio Ouachita, when they met with a few Delaware Indians, who corrected their error, and conduced them to Fort Towson, at which they encamped and reached this city on Sunday last. They arrived on Red river in forty-five days, not incurring the slightest indisposition among the men, and without losing a single mule. Had not been compelled to wait for a steamboat, would have been here in sixty days, from the time of their leaving Chihuahua, and notwithstanding their apprehensions at setting out, their journey was the most agreeable and pleasant that can be imagined.

gentlemen have come to New Orleans for purpose of buying an assortment of goods. One of those gentlemen have assured us, that if trade was restored by our government, and back allowed on foreign merchandise imported into this country, which is the whole trade of Chihuahua, and as far west as the Pacific ocean, would flow in this direction, all the bullion, although its exportation is prohibited by the Mexican laws, would find its way to our country. Bullion brought from Mexico to the New Orleans mint, would clear ten and a half per cent.—ten per cent. export duty, the difference between British and American gold coin. This profit is of itself a strong inducement to the bullion from the Mexican mines to our country, and the experiment being now made, and the way opened, we have little doubt that a plentiful supply of that article will be brought to New Orleans.

of the individuals attached to this caravan. My term is, and natives of the U. States, old friends between St. Louis and Chihuahua via Santa Fe. They state that the distance from St. Louis to Santa Fe is 1,350 miles due west, thence to Chihuahua more than 650 miles due south, the route forming a right angle; whereas the distance from Chihuahua to Peran Point is only eight hundred miles, the road lying west by south; the difficulty of land carriage, consequently is 1,200 miles less this saving in the cost of transportation, is not interrupted in the whole route by the presence of a single Mexican custom house, except a trifling duty at Chihuahua. The distance from Matamoros to that place is near 1,200 miles.

SUMATRA. The Boston Daily Advertiser has an extract of a letter from a gentleman who visited the coast of Sumatra subsequently to the destruction of the town of Muckie by the U. S. S. Columbia and John Adams. The writer says the natives were penitent enough, and very desirous to trade with him. He adds: "In the declaration of Muckie the natives have been taught that they will not soon forget; and the punishment soon following the aggression has enhanced its good effect. The natives are now at war among themselves about this affair. The inhabitants of Muckie belong to a tribe called Archeon, against whom a powerful clan, called Pedier, have made war, on the ground that the Americans will not be afraid to trade on the coast in consequence of the outrage on the "Eclipse," perpetrated by the former. The rajah of Quallah Battoo, who belongs to the same tribe as the rajah of Muckie, has already lost two of his three forts, and the war is still raging in his country, but assistance has been sent to him from Muckie, and I think the war will soon be terminated."

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS OF 1838. The report of the secretary of the treasury on the commerce of the United States, for 1838, from September 1837, to October 1838, exhibits the following aggregates: Whole amount of merchandise imported into the United States. $113,717,404. Of this the value of that paying specific duties is 25,766,919. Paying ad valorem duties, 27,090,480. Imported free of duty, 60,860,005.

The amount of imports free of duty is much larger than the value of dutiable articles. The latter is $52,857,399. The importation of wines and spirituous liquors pays one-fourteenth part of the whole revenue of the United States. Value of teas imported 3 1/2 millions. Of coffee, 7 millions.

Of the merchandise imported, $102,057,448 came in American vessels, and $10,629,956 in foreign vessels.

The value of exports of the growth, produce, and manufacture of the United States, in 1838, is as follows: From the sea, fisheries and oil, $3,175,576. From the forest, timber, tar, &c. 5,200,499. From the field, 9,103,414. Bolls, tobacco, 7,392,029. Cotton, 61,556,811. All other products, 140,093. Manufactures of all kinds, 9,463,289.

Total, all exports, $96,093,291. Tonnage. The number and tonnage of American vessels, entered in the United States, from foreign countries, 1838 was 6,079 vessels, of 1,302,974 tons. Number of men and boys in crews, 65,945. Foreign vessels entered, 3,696. Tonnage 592,110. Crews, 35,000. Number of American vessels cleared for foreign ports, 6,441. Number of foreign vessels, 3,703. American tonnage, 1,408,761. Foreign, 604,166. Number of American crews, 67,895. Foreign, 34,612. [Boston Morning Post.]

THE TRADE OF ENGLAND. The official returns which we just have made public relative to the trade of the United Kingdom prove that, though the year 1838 was not marked by any speculations, still the trade of the country is in a healthy and sound condition. It is shown by these returns that the value of imports into the United Kingdom (as per official valuation) was £1,268,320, being an increase of £6,500,000 over the imports of 1837.—The increase of exports of the produce and manufactures of the United Kingdom has been from £72,548,047 to £2,450,231, or very nearly £20,000,000. According to the returns, the real or declared value of the produce and manufactures of the United Kingdom shipped off in the year ending on 5th January last was £5,060,970, or about 8,000,000 more than the exports of 1837. The new vessels built last year in the United Kingdom amounted to 1,490, of the tonnage of 270,280 tons. In the registration of vessels in the ports of Great Britain there was not any material increase last year—the amount or 31st of December last was 26,609 ships of the aggregate tonnage of 2,890,604 tons, and having on board 178,583 men. In the number of British and foreign vessels employed in the foreign trade there has been a considerable increase within the last three years, namely, from 21,473 in 1837, to 24,798 in the commencement of the present year.—The aggregate amount of the tonnage of these vessels has been increased from 3,404,370 tons, and 191,510 men to 3,997,053 tons and 223,300 men.—The quantity of British shipments which cleared outward from the United Kingdom for foreign ports in the year ending on 5th Jan. last was 15,907 vessels of 2,876,236 tons, and 162,763 men, showing an increase over the returns of the previous year of 33,000 tons, and nearly 15,000 men. There was also an increase in the number of foreign ships, their tonnage and crews, which cleared out from the British ports last year. The totals of both, on 5th January last, were 24,447 vessels of 4,099,039 tons, and employing 231,149 men. It appears from these statements, made from official data, that not only is the trade and commerce of the country in a favorable position, but that the British as well as the foreign ship owners are in a more flourishing condition than they have been for many years past. [London Sun.]

POWERFUL LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE. We find in the Boston Daily Advertiser the following particulars of an extraordinary performance of a locomotive engine at Lowell.

A trial was made on Thursday last on the Lowell rail road, of the power of a locomotive engine, built by the Locks and Canal Manufacturing company at Lowell, for the western rail road. This was the second trial of the engine, the first having been made a few days before. Being built for a rail road on which there are steeper gradients than on the Lowell road, or any of the rail roads leading directly from Boston, it is constructed of a greater weight and power than any engine in use on either of those roads. The weight, on the occasion of the first trial was ascertained to be, including the water in the boiler, 22,275 lbs. and the weight on the driving wheels 14,970 lbs. The diameter of the cylinders is 12 inches—stroke of the piston 18 inches; diameter of the driving wheels 43 feet.

The Boston and Lowell rail road, on which these trials were made, is 26 miles in length—has a double track—and is built in the best manner, with a substantial edge, or trail—having no greater rate of ascent or descent than 10 feet in a mile, except in the 26th mile, where it descends for a short distance, in approaching the Lowell depot, at the rate of 30 feet in a mile, and the curvature of less radius than 3,000 feet, except at the turn-outs, from one track to the other.

On the first trial above mentioned, the load attached to the engine consisted of 54 loaded cars and one empty car, the whole weighing, exclusive of the tender, 235 1/2 English tons, or 264 tons of 2,000 lbs. This load was conveyed from the depot in Boston to the 25th mile post in Lowell as follows:

	H	M.

23d "	42	descent 6 feet.
24th "	45	descent 5 feet.
25th "	48	train stopped on descent of 30 feet per mile, an engine taken off.

The time of making the passage of 25 miles, deducting the stop at the tenth mile post, was two hours one minute—average rate being 12 2/5 miles per hour—the steam pressure was gauged at 60 lbs. and steam was blowing off freely the whole time.

It being evident from this trial that the engine would take a considerably heavier load, a second trial was made as above mentioned, on Thursday last. A load was prepared of 63 cars, filled with merchandise, which was ascertained to weigh in all 666,140 pounds, equal to 333 tons of 2,000 pounds, or 297 English tons. The day was unfavorable, there being a fresh north westerly wind, adverse to the direction of the train. The engine, however, being attached to the load, started it without difficulty from a state of rest, and proceeded with it over the level part of the road, and for two or three miles, where it was partially protected from the wind, over the ascent of 10 feet a mile, at a rate of eight or ten miles an hour; but on coming to a part where the wind blew with full force in an oblique direction upon the whole length of the train, it came to a stop, and it was found necessary to take off a part of the load. We have not before us the minutes of the exact performance on the different parts of the line, but we learn that on the most difficult part of the road, notwithstanding the adverse wind, the load carried by the engine, without assistance, was equal to 2 1/2 tons. We hope before the end of the next month, to hear of the prowess of this and other engines on the western road, in travelling from Worcester to Springfield.

A SHIP SNAGGED ON THE OCEAN. The Courier & Enquirer of Wednesday contains the annexed interesting account of the snagging of a ship in the middle of the ocean by coming in contact with the mast of a sunken vessel. The ship Cornelia, capt. Cushman, sailed from Havana to Amsterdam, on the 20th of July. The following extract from her log describes an extraordinary unusual disaster.

31st. Commences, fine pleasant weather, and clear, with strong steady breezes from the S. W. Course E. by N. with lower topmast, and topgallant studding sail set. At 9h. 30m. P. M. we struck upon a ship's lower mast upon our starboard bow, which stove a hole about 12 inches square. Both pumps were instantly at work to free the ship; studding sails were all hauled in, and all sail shortened from the ship, and her headway stopped as soon as possible. We then cut away the water casks and rolled them aft to endeavor to get the leak above water. At 10 P. M. sounded pumps and found 3 feet water in the hold; commenced to break out the main hatchway, and throw the cargo overboard to lighten the ship; but she gained too much upon us, for upon sounding the pumps at 10h. 30m. we found 7 feet water in the hold and the ship sinking very fast. We now found it a matter of impossibility to keep her afloat much longer. Our attention was next turned to the boat, which we finally succeeded in getting overboard, and a small supply of provisions put into them, such as the exigency of the moment would allow. At 11h. 30m. we got into our boats, and laid, with a line attached to the ship's weather gun, in anxious suspense, expecting to see her at any moment in view would disappear from our sight forever. At 3h. 30m. A. M. after waiting in our boats in doleful silence, the ship had become very deep; she commenced rolling, and finally gave a gentle plunge by the head and settled down head first; but a few minutes sufficed, and the once gallant Cornelia was sunk out of sight forever. Upon looking round us, we saw at once our situation clearly depicted before us—there was no alternative but to make the best of our way for the land. Capt. Cushman gave the necessary orders and remarks relative to the proceedings we were to take for our safety, then mentioned to us that we were 260 miles N. W. of Nantucket. Our provisions were next looked into, and a stipulated allowance of bread and water given. The remainder of Thursday was employed in fitting sails for the boats, and arranging our several articles in the boats.

Friday, 2d August. Strong breezes from the S. W.—boats all in company, standing to the N. E. before the sea.

Saturday 3d. Heavy gales from the S. W. with an uncommon heavy sea running, it being almost past the art of man to keep the boats from being swamped, the sea broke so tremendous—the launch filled once, but we succeeded in weathering the gale without any apparent damage, except our provisions, which got wet.

Sunday, 4th. Fine pleasant weather. Wind from the N. and E. Course N. W. employed drying our bread, clothing, &c.

Monday, 5th. Pleasant clear weather, the boats all in company, standing N. W.—saw a sail in the morning standing to the S. and W. could not near her. All hands looking eagerly for a sail, an half a biscuit and a mouthful of water made but a scanty meal to subsist long upon. At 5 P. M. saw a brig coming directly for us which proved to be the Orb, of Portland, in which vessel we met with a comfortable reception until another could be provided to take us to New York. August 8, spoke the brig Olive Branch, bound to Boston, by which vessel we were brought to Boston.

The Cornelia was owned by Messrs. F. Gebhard & Co. of New York, and was insured in the Ocean Insurance office $10,000, and her freight list for $6,000 in London and Holland. The circumstances occasioning her loss, are, we understand, almost without precedent.

EDUCATION OF MUTES AND THE BLIND. The hon. Jas. C. Spencer, secretary of state and ex-officio superintendent of all public places of instruction, visited this city last week, and examined the two institutions appropriated by the state munificence to the education of the deaf and blind. The Albany Evening Journal, in account of the remarkable progress made by the pupils, says, of that for the deaf and dumb:

"The pupils all read with facility and are ready writers in a beautiful hand. There was one poor boy bereft not only of speech and hearing, but with a withered right arm hanging dead at his side. And yet that "sionr lamb" was well advanced in his studies, and wrote handsomely with his left hand! There was a youth from somewhere in the wilds of Canada, who did not know his name—(if he knew a name)—but who had found his way—he knew not how—to the institution, and has been raised by the bounty of the state, from a mere animal existence, to the enjoyment and blessings of intellectual life. His faculties are developing and his character forming under the most gratifying auspices. He is among the best pupils and received a premium for his good behavior and rapid improvement."

Though most of them are under sixteen years, the editor doubts if any school in the state, can present pupils in the enjoyment of all their faculties, who are as thoroughly instructed in reading, writing, geography and history;

The senior class, though great proficients were rejoiced when it was announced to them, that the secretary of state would continue them in their studies for another year. The secretary then awarded the premiums, remarking, however, that the performances of all, without exception, deserved high encomiums.

The pupils of the blind institution, though subjected to a severe examination in grammar, geography and mathematics, by eminent professors, excited astonishment by the ability they displayed. Their fabrics also in the workshop, such as carpet, mat and rug weaving, were greatly admired, as also was the sewing and knitting of the female pupils. Another branch which is very properly cultivated, and which they have made great progress, is music. The performances on the piano and guitar, and the execution of difficult pieces by the blind deaf, produced the most lively sensations on all present—music is at once a delightful consolation to them, and may be a source of profitable livelihood. The sense of hearing is infinitely more perfect in blind persons, hence the perfection in music.

INTERESTING CEREMONY. Married on the morning of the 1st ultimo, at the institution of the deaf and dumb in this city, by the rev. Dr. Milnor, Mr. J. R. Burnett, of Livingston, N. J. to Miss Phoebe Osborne, of Castile, Genessee county, N. Y. (a pupil of the institution).

We have seldom attended a matrimonial occasion of more agreeable interest than the one above mentioned. We will not attempt a minute description of the scene, though a full chapter might be written on it, which would be well worth reading to those who are particularly interested in what relates to the deaf and dumb, and those who are curious to know how the marriage ceremony of two deaf mute persons would be conducted.

At nine and a half A. M. the bride and her maids were dressed and decked with flowers, and the bridegroom and several of his relatives and friends arrived in carriages from town. Four pretty deaf mute girls officiated as bride's maids, accompanied by two deaf mute young men, and two of the young gentlemen professors of the institution. Attended by these four couples; the pair betrothed, at ten o'clock, entered the large apartment in the west wing of the institution, where, in the presence of an assemblage of some 200 persons, consisting of the pupils of the institution, the professors, matrons, &c. the principal and his family—the officiating clergyman, and numerous invited guests, they were to be united in "the holy estate of matrimony" after the Episcopal rite, by the rev. Dr. Milnor, (president of the institution), in his happiest and most impressive manner. The interpretation of the spoken words, sentence by sentence, to the mute married pair, and the mute portion of the audience, was performed by Mr. Peet, in his peculiarly elegant and forcible mode of exhibiting the sign of language; nor could it for a moment be doubted that those most interested in the exercises of the occasion fully comprehended the sense of the interpretation, when in answer to the several questions put to them, their nods of affirmation were returned, with an expression of most devout meaning, and emphatic determination, directly to the officiating clergyman, each in turn seeming to say, "yea, surely, and I mean it too."

The solemnities of the occasion were terminated by prayers and the benediction, by Dr. Milnor, in the usual salutatory, affirmations, &c. and at 11 the bride, after taking an affectionate leave of her fellow pupils, her instructors and friends of the institution, departed with her husband and his friends, to her new home west of the Passaic.

VOTES FOR GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA.

The following is a correct list of the several candidates for the executive chair of this state, from the year 1790 to the last, in 1838, with the respective votes of each, and the majority of the successful candidate; all taken from the official returns, except the last, which is made from the report of the senate's committee, and includes all the votes polled legal as well as illegal. It was compiled by M. Hazard, editor of the Statistical Register.

FIFTH ANNUAL FAIR OF THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK. Circular. The fair of the institute will be held at Castle Garden, commencing Monday September 2d, 1839.

The object of exhibition fairs is to present to members of the institute and their fellow citizens who are engaged in the mechanic and fine arts in manufactures, the means of making their talents and ingenuity known in a way which no other facilities afford; the many thousands who visit exhibitions have a much better opportunity of judging of the merits of the various products than they would have by a mere verbal or newspaper description, besides the advantages so brought together, in one vast collection, the ducts of the skill, ingenuity and industry of country.

To render this exhibition worthy of the arts, of the ingenuity of the American people, the managers appointed to conduct the approaching have determined to make such liberal arrangements as will insure to the contributors a fair opportunity of exhibiting their productions to the greatest would as yet, have been wrapt in the sleep of nature, undisturbed, save by the tramp of the bellowing bison, or the war cry of the forest chief. But for him, these broad and beautiful prairies, "clothed in their flowery vesture," would yet expand beneath the sun to "waste their sweetness on the desert air."

THE OLDEN TIME. A correspondent of the New York American, writing from Utica, says:

Fifty years ago, the spot where Utica now stands, was the end of the world, in this direction. In those days, John Jacob Astor, and Peter Smith, (father of Gerrit), travelled the ground from Schenectady to Utica on foot, purchasing furs from the Indian settlements on the route. The Indians aided them in carrying the furs back to Schenectady. Returned from their perilous adventure to "the far west," they opened a little shop in New York city and sold the skins at retail. When their stock was exhausted, they again penetrated the lonely forests of "the frontier," and replenished their store. Astor continued the business many years, but Smith commenced the purchase of land. Summers went and came, and wave after wave of emigration rolled up the long defile of the Mohawk. Mark the change. Two years since, Smith died at Schenectady, leaving millions of acres to his heirs. Astor still lives, one of the wealthiest unfledged commoners in the world. Judge Smith lived to travel the route from Schenectady to Utica in four hours. And to-day, when the sun's evening rays shall hide from the undimmed eye of John Jacob Astor behind the blue hills of Jersey, its vertical beams will be falling on the fur traders of our new Ultima-Thule, at the mouth of the Oregon. Bishop Berkeley never dreamed of such changes when he penned the line,

"Westward the star of empire takes its way."

TIPPOO SULTAN'S THRONE. The sultan's throne, we are told too unwieldily to be conveyed away was broken up. It consisted of a howdah, or armed chair, upon a tiger covered with sheet gold; the ascent was by silver steps, gilt; the canopy was equally superb, and decorated with a costly fringe of white pearls all around it. The eyes and teeth were of glass;—it was valued at 60,000 pagodas, or upwards of £25,000 sterling. The sheet gold alone was estimated at 40,000 pagodas. Every inch of the howdah contained Arabic inscriptions, chiefly from the Koran, and superbly stamped, being raised and polished in a beautiful manner. A gold figure of a lion covered over with the most precious stones, was fastened at the top of the canopy; its beak was a large emerald, its eyes were carbuncles; the breast was covered with diamonds; on its back were many large jewels, fancifully arranged; while the tail, made to resemble a peacock, was actually studied in the same manner. The whole was so formed as to have the appearance of plumage, and so closely set, that the gold was hardly to be seen.

[Alexander's life of the duke of Wellington.

THE SOVEREIGNS OF EUROPE. We have lately met with an amusing letter written by Jefferson in 1810, we think to a friend of his, formerly governor of New Hampshire. It relates to the European monarchs of his day and acquaintance, and speaks pretty freely of them, as the following passage may show:

"Louis XVI was a fool, of my own knowledge and in, despite of the answers made for him at his trial. The king of Spain was a fool; of Naples the same. They passed their lives in hunting, and despatched two couriers a week, one thousand miles, to let each other know what game they had killed the preceding days. The king of Sardinia was a fool. All these were Bourbons. The queen of Portugal, a Braganza, was an idiot by nature. And so was the king of Denmark, their sons, as regents exercised the powers of government. The king of Prussia, successor to the great Frederick, was a mere hog in body as well as mind. Gustavus of Sweden, and Joseph of Austria, were really crazy, and George of England, you know, was in a straight jacket. There remained then, none but old Catharine, who had been too lately picked up to have lost her common sense. In this state Bonaparte fou Europe, and it was this state of its rulers which led it with scarce a struggle. These animals had become without mind and powerless; and so will ever hereditary monarchy after a few generations. Alexander the grand son of Catharine, is yet an exception. He is able to hold his own. But he is on of the third generation. His race is not yet worn out. And so endeth the book of kings, from all which the Lord deliver us."

VERIFICATION OF ANCIENT PROVERB. The following prophecy is said to have been delivered by a British bard, in the time of William the Norman, and preserved by some of the monkish annalists, viz: That no more than three monarchs, in direct succession, should ever again reign over these kingdoms, without some violent interruption:

- 1 William the Norman,
 - 2 William Rufus,
 - 3 Henry the first,
- Interrupted by the usurpation of Stephen.
- 1 Henry the second,
 - 2 Edward the first,
 - 3 Edward the second,
- Interrupted by the abdication and murder of Edward the second.
- 1 Edward the third,
 - 2 Richard the second,
- Interrupted by the deposition of that monarch.
- 1 Henry the fourth,
 - 2 Henry the fifth,
 - 3 Henry the sixth.

Interrupted by the restoration of the house of York.

- 1 Edward the fourth,
- 2 Edward the fifth,
- 3 Richard the third,

Interrupted by the usurpation of Henry Richmond.

- 1 Henry the seventh,
 - 2 Henry the eighth,
 - 3 Edward the sixth,
- Interrupted by the election of lady Jane Grey.
- 1 Mary,
 - 2 Elizabeth,

A foreign king, (James of Scotland), called in to assume the crown.

- 1 James the first,
- 2 Charles the first,

Interrupted by the deposition of that monarch and the establishment of another form of government in the person of Oliver Cromwell.

- 1 Charles the second,
- 2 James the second,

Interrupted by the abdication of that king and the election of a foreigner.

- 1 William the third,
- 2 Anne,

Interrupted by the parliamentary appointment of a foreigner.

- 1 George the first,
- 2 George the second,
- 3 George the third,

Interrupted by the unfortunate incapacity of that sovereign, and a parliamentary appointment for exercising the sovereignty in the person of the prince regent.

- 1 George the fourth,
- 2 William the fourth,
- 3 Victoria the first,

Whom may God bless, but what is to be the next interruption? [Liverpool Courier.

LATE FROM ENGLAND.
ARRIVAL OF THE LIVERPOOL.

This long expected steamer arrived at New York on Saturday night last, after a voyage of eighteen days. She brings news of importance, commercial and political. The death of sultan Mahmud, the defeat of his army by Ibrahim in Syria, the defection of the Turkish fleet, and the continued agitation of the Chartists in England, are the principal items of political intelligence. The firmness of the cotton market will be the most welcome news to a majority of our readers. The editors of the New York American have received full files of English papers, from which they have gleaned the following intelligence:

London, July 18. Money market. The English stock market has been extremely quiet since the bustle of yesterday. Foreign securities remain without alteration.

July 19. Much difficulty is experienced in the city at present in obtaining a supply of silver, the furnishing of which by the bank is optional. The transactions of the day in the English stock market were of slight importance, but prices are rather depressed. No alteration in foreign stocks. There was a tendency to improvement in the rates of exchange to-day on Paris and Amsterdam.

July 20. Scarcely any variation in the funds, and business exceedingly flat all day. No change in foreign.

July 22. The funds remain in the same languid state, with very little business doing. The dealers are waiting for the next movement of the bank in the affairs of the dead-weight, respecting which the same uncertainty prevails. In the foreign house there was some improvement in Spanish American securities. Mexican advanced to 17 1-2, in consequence of a statement in the New Orleans papers of the ratification of the agreement for a conversion and a new arrangement of the original debt and dividends effected by the agents here some time since.

July 23. The funds were inactive, and consols declined to 91 7-8 on the publication of the defeat of the Turkish army by the Egyptians—they recovered slightly at the close when they were 92 for money, and 92 1-8 to 1-4 for ac. A further improvement took place in Mexican to 23 1-2; Columbian, 32 3-4 to 3. Exchanges nearly the same as last post day.

July 24. A very extraordinary and unusual operation on the part of the Bank of England has been reported to-day in the city, and there is every reason to believe that the circumstances connected with it are, in substance at least, correct. An arrangement is said to have been entered into with the Bank of France to allow bills to be drawn upon it, not directly, for that the charter will not permit, but indirectly through certain houses in Paris, the means of payment to be provided by the French bank. These bills have necessarily the same effect in this market as an exportation of gold in drawing in bank notes, the value being paid to the Bank of England; and also the effect of ordinary commercial bills in raising the exchanges. The other consequences of the operation, of a far more serious nature, are that the Bank of England is placed in the situation of a borrower from the Bank of France, and, like all other borrowers from banks, must put in a security for re-payment, which is understood in this case to be such a portion of the "dead weight" annuity as may be sufficient for the purpose; altogether amounting to this—that the Bank of England holding a larger amount of securities than can be with convenience managed, "re-discount" them. But for the drafts on Paris, to which this operation has given rise, the exchanges could not, it is supposed, have been sustained at the rates negotiated yesterday.

Large sales of exchequer bills, which were believed to be for the account of the bank, were made in the course of the day, but this is denied by parties having access to the best information, who imagine that the sales are for the account of the government. These sales reduced the premium on exchequer bills to 10s. to 12s. and, together with other sales of 3 per cent. reduced and bank stock on private account, caused some heaviness in the funds generally.

In the foreign market a slight improvement may be noted.

July 26. Great mystery still attaches to the alleged transactions between the Banks of England and France, and the question at any rate is very far from being disposed of in the way some of the bank oracles would desire to have it supposed. It has transpired that count d'Argout, the governor of the Bank of France, who was in London early in the week, with the intention of proceeding on a tour through the manufacturing districts in Scotland, has returned suddenly to Paris; that Mr. T. A. Curtis, the late governor of our bank, has also gone thither, and that he either has been, or is to be, joined by one of the partners in the eminent bank which has been engaged to draw bills on Paris. That bills are drawing on Paris, and to an enormous amount, for the account of the bank, no one now ventures to deny.

It has been currently reported to-day in the city, that at the meeting of the bank directors held yesterday, it was debated whether the rate of interest should not be raised to 6 per cent. and that, on the motion being put, the decision was against it by the casting vote of the governor only.

The transactions in the funds to-day have been exceedingly unimportant.

In the foreign house, the only alteration in prices worth notice was in Mexican, which advanced to 39 to 1-9.

Some improvement was to be noted in the rates of exchange negotiated on Amsterdam. On Paris and Hamburg they were as before.

From Friday's Gazette. Quarterly average of the weekly liabilities and assets of the Bank of England, from the 30th of April, to the 23d July, 1839, both inclusive, published pursuant to the act 3 and 4 William IV. cap. 95.

Liabilities.		Assets.
Circulation, £	13,049,000	Securities	£24,905,000
Deposites,	7,953,000	Bullion,	7,785,000
	£26,004,000		£28,690,000

Downing street, July 25.

July 27. There has been little activity in the funds to-day, but some attention was excited by the sales of exchequer bills to the extent of about 300,000, by the broker usually acting for the bank. It was ascertained that the sales were for reinvestment in stocks for other parties. The transactions in the foreign house were of little importance.

The usual average return of the liabilities and assets of the Bank of England, embracing the period from the 30th of April to the 23d inst. gives the following results—viz: that the average of the month ending the 23d inst. as compared with the average of the month ending the 30th of April, shows a decrease in the circulation of 156,000, an increase in the deposits of 1,164,000, and a decrease in the stock of bullion of 1,677,000. Wherefore it appears, that the increase in the liabilities is 1,603,000, and this represents the increase in the total quantity of money in the month ending the 23d inst. as compared with the month ending the 30th of April, in so far as regards the administration of the currency by the Bank of England.

The yearly comparison is as follows:—The average of the month ending the 23d inst. as compared with the month of the 21st of August, 1838, shows a decrease in the circulation of 1,443,000, a decrease in the deposits of 2,751,000, and a decrease in the stock of bullion of 6,372,000. Wherefore it appears that the decrease in the liabilities is 4,274,000, and this represents the decrease in the total quantity of money in the month ending the 23d inst. as compared with the month ending the 21st of August, 1838, in so far as regards the administration of the currency by the Bank of England.

July 29. The transaction in the funds were rather more extensive to-day than for some time past. The sales of exchequer bills were continued to the amount of about 10,000, and a good deal of money stock changed hands, but the market displayed much firmness, and purchases of consols for time were made to some extent.

The intelligence from the United States by the Shakspeare and the Samson packet ships, with dates to the 11th instant, is far from being of a satisfactory character.

July 30. From the Paris papers and letters it would appear, not only that the accounts were substantially true, of an attempted arrangement between the Bank of England and the Bank of France, but that the additional mortification is imposed, of two failures in the applications made—one to the Bank of France, and the other to the capitalists of Paris. English exchequer bills, it seems, are not good security at Paris, because they would not, at short notice, be convertible so as to answer banking purposes. The transaction is the universal topic of discussion in the city, and every where severely reprobated.

The English stock market was heavy, and business very limited.

The rates of exchange on Amsterdam continue to improve. On Hamburg the rate remains 13. 10 at three months.

July 31—city, 12 o'clock. The foreign exchanges yesterday did not show much alteration in the rates from those of last Friday, but the amount of business transacted was much smaller than on that day. All parties seemed rather inclined to wait and see the upshot of the bank negotiation in Paris before they committed themselves by large operations. It is probable the quotations would have advanced if the state of the weather had not created a little alarm for the fate of the approaching harvest. At all events it is a satisfaction to observe that the demand for bills to remit to the continent appears to slacken, from which we may hope that a reaction will soon occur, if nothing happen to render a further importation of corn necessary.

There has been in very great demand in the open market during the last three or four days, and the rate of discount is gradually tending upwards. This is probably caused by large sums being withdrawn by the bank through the medium of discounted bills falling due and encashed by them daily. In the stock market also there is more demand for money than there was a few days ago; and the settlement of the monthly account in foreign funds, which takes place to-day, does not seem to throw loose capital, as it has done on one or two late occasions. The stock market is heavy, both for English and foreign securities.

Consols are 91 7-8 to 92 for money, and 92 1-8 to 92 1-4 for account; new 2 1-2 per cents 99 1-8 to 99 1-4; exchequer bills, 10 to 12 prem.

Two o'clock. We learn at the north and south American Coffee House that the East India company have received despatches from India overland, from China to the 7th April, Calcutta the 20th of May, and Bombay the 8th June. The China trade was again stopped, and captain Elliott, the British resident, together with thirteen of the principal English merchants, had been sent prisoners into the interior. This intelligence has had an unfavorable effect on consols, which have declined to 91 5-8 to 3-4 for money, and 92 for account; bank stock is 1-2 per cent. lower, having been sold at 185; exchequer bills are 1s. higher. The settlement of account in foreign stocks is going off quietly, but prices are lower.

Four o'clock. Consols 51 3-4; consols for account 92; Belgian 103 1-2; Brazilian 78 3-4 Columbian 1824, 32 1-2; do. August 15, 32 1-4; Mexican 1825, 29 1-4; do. Aug. 15, 29 3-8.

London, July 27. Foreign funds. Last official quotation for the week, ending Friday evening: Alabamas (payable 1863) 5's, 80; Louisiana, 5's, 94; Mexican 6's, 27 1-4.

There has been no novelty since our last in the market for money and public securities. The dead weight is now dead and buried; and on Thursday, which is now the most sensitive day in all the week for the citizens, it being the day on which the bank directors meet—there was no advance of the rate of interest by the bank. The rates of discount on the first bills continue at 5 to 5 1-2 per cent. and at 5 1-2 to 6 on those of the next descriptions; little tradesmen have to pay high charges for accommodation. The demand for money has not been by any means oppressive; no doubt the payment of the dividends has eased the market a little.

[London Mercantile Journal, July 30.]

Liverpool, August 1. The state of the weather is beginning to excite the apprehensions of every reflecting man. Mr. Rice, our immitable chancellor of the exchequer, told parliament that the quantity of foreign corn imported since last harvest, amounted to the value of £2,000,000. In confirmation of this, and in proof that the imported corn was paid for in solid metal, the Bank of England, which had upwards of £10,000,000 of gold in its coffers only a short time ago, has, at the present moment, not much more than £3,000,000.

Birmingham, July 15th. This town has again been the scene of riot and confusion. The police were ordered to disperse a meeting of the people, when a general fight ensued. Having beaten off the police, the mob attacked several shops and private dwellings. The street lamps were put out, and under cover of the darkness, doors and windows were forced, and the contents of the houses thrown into the street and burnt. Several houses were also consumed. Near midnight a squadron of cavalry succeeded in clearing the streets, and escorted the engines to the spot. It is a singular fact, that during these disturbances no person was killed.

Fenny postage. It is intended that the act to carry out Mr. Rowland Hill's plan of reform penny postage shall come into operation in January next.

Admiral Sir Isaac Coffin died at Cheltenham on the 23d of July.

A very destructive fire had occurred in Manchester, by which the warehouses of the Messrs. Nathan, Lloyd street, was destroyed, and damages sustained to the amount of £13,000.

There appears to be a slight revival of trade in Lancashire, but the factories generally are "working short time."

A Catholic church has been opened at Everingham, in a style of splendor unequalled in England. The building cost £30,000; and the procession of bishops and clergy, with the pope's banners and the host elevated, was more splendid than ever witnessed in modern days in this country.

[Sheffield Iris.]

The proceedings in the French court of peers were formally closed on the 12th of July, when judgment was pronounced on the prisoners, four guilty of participation in the last Paris insurrection. Armand Barbes was the only prisoner condemned to death—he was found guilty of being "one of the murderers" of a lieutenant named Drouineau, in addition to his treason. Martin Barnard was sentenced to transportation; Mialon to hard labor for life; and seven others to terms of imprisonment varying from two to fifteen years. The sentence on Barbes has been commuted by Louis Philippe to hard labor for life. It is said that the council of ministers strongly dissuaded the king from this act of mercy.

Madrid papers of the 13th of July, state that general Aznar of the queen's army, was besieged in Lucena by Cabrera. General O'Donnel was about to march to his relief. It was reported in Bayonne, on the 15th, that Cabrera had taken possession of Lucena. There is no other Spanish news of importance. The elections were to commence on the 24th.

The beautiful cathedral at Bruges has been destroyed by a fire, occasioned by the carelessness of some plumbers at work in the building.

It will be seen that a whole galaxy of theatrical stars have come out by the Liverpool, principally for the national theatre. The Liverpool was crowded with passengers, and seventy guineas were offered and refused for a berth in her just before she sailed.

From the Chronicle. The Turkish and Egyptian war. The Monitor of Friday contained the following telegraphic despatch from Marseilles of the events of the 25th:

"The death of the sultan was known at Alexandria on the 8th; and on the following day a Turkish schooner reached Alexandria with Negib bey, kiaya of the captain pasha, on board, charged to announce to the viceroy of Egypt the presence of the captain pasha at Slankio, on his way to Rhodes, and to propose to place the Turkish fleet under the viceroy's protection, in order to guard against the troubles likely to follow the sultan's death in Turkey. A reply was despatched by Mehemet Ali, in the steamboat called the Black Sea, to the captain pasha; but its tenor is unknown. On the 10th, Askif Efendi, sent by the sultan to announce the death of his father, reached Alexandria.

The death of the Turkish sultan, Mahmooud, which occurred on the 30th ultimo, is an event of some political importance. Abdul Medjid, his eldest son, not yet seventeen years old, though of full age by the Turkish law, was immediately declared sultan. The principal officers of the government assembled round the bed of the dying Mahmooud, and sworn fealty to his successor. The new sultan is described as a young man of quiet disposition, fond of literary pursuits, and well acquainted with the Persian, Greek and French languages.

The late sultan was born in 1755, and succeeded to the throne in July, 1808. His great achievement, the destruction of the Janissaries, is a remarkable event in Turkish history; but his reign will be chiefly remembered for the rapid curtailment of the empire, the progress of Russia, and the establishment of a virtually independent sovereignty under Mehemet Ali in Egypt and Syria.

"The Turks have been utterly defeated by the Egyptians in a great battle, fought on the 25th of June, at Nezib, near Aleppo. It is said that upwards of 4,000 Turks were killed in the engagement, and that the prisoners taken were 5,000. All their material, cannon, and ammunition, fell into the hands of the victors, and Ibrahim has written a brief account of his success to Mehemet Ali in the Turkish general's camp. Admiral Roussin, French ambassador at Constantinople, assured his government that the information received by the port was that the Turkish army had been 'destroyed'; but this is perhaps too strong an expression, as it appears that after the battle Ibrahim made a retrograde movement to Aintab; whence it may be inferred that the Turks were, notwithstanding their defeat, in a position to give him trouble and render caution necessary.

There is much speculation in the French and German newspapers on the probable consequences of Mehemet Ali's success. Will the conqueror push his advantage and march upon Constantinople? Will he be restrained by the European powers, who have declared their resolution to preserve the Turkish empire entire? The cunning policy of the Egyptian pasha renders it tolerably certain that he will not risk an open contest with France, England and Austria; but will use his victory so as to obtain favorable terms in a treaty. It will be difficult to eject him from Syria, and perhaps that country may be added to his nominal vice-royalty, but real sovereignty, of Egypt.

It is alleged that lord Ponsonby stimulated the late sultan to hostilities with Egypt, and that Mehemet Ali is enraged at this double-dealing on the part of England.

The Turkish fleet sailed from the Dardanelles on the 28th of June, notwithstanding the positive prohibitions of the port; and hence a suspicion of treachery on the part of its commanders has arisen. Alexandria, July 6. The Turkish army of Syria is defunct. The following are the facts:—

On the 20th of June, his highness Ibrahim pasha, commanding the Egyptian army, moved from its encampment, and crossed the Ladjour, and then marched to the village of Mezza, where the sultan's cavalry, commanded by 4,000 men, were encamped. His highness Ibrahim pasha ordered all his artillery to take up a position within half a mile of the Turkish army, and to cannonade it. At 5 P. M. they opened their fire; in half an hour the Turkish cavalry fled, pell-mell, in the direction of Nezib, (where the sultan's main army was encamped under Hafiz pasha), leaving behind them all their provisions and military chests. His highness Ibrahim pasha then halted the Egyptian force for repose till midnight.

June 21. At midnight he marched towards Nezib; fell in, after daylight, with the cavalry he had cannonaded the day before, and all the remaining cavalry of the Turkish force, which had been advanced in two divisions.

Ibrahim pasha ordered the artillery to commence their fire, and his cavalry to charge. In four hours the whole of the sultan's cavalry gave way and fled, leaving 14 pieces of small cannon (all they had) behind.

June 22. The Egyptian army reposed. June 23. His highness, with two regiments of cavalry, accompanied by his body guard and his light artillery, left the camp and trotted up to the walls of Nezib, leaving orders with Suleman pasha, his lieutenant general, to move on after him, as slowly as possible, in order that the troops might not be fatigued.

On the 24th, at midnight, the whole of the Egyptian force was in presence of the Turks, and shortly afterwards commenced the general action, of which I give you an account in the following extract of a letter from the Austrian consul at Aleppo, dated June 26th, in the evening:

"The army of Hafiz pasha ceased to exist yesterday, after a cannonade of three hours. The Turks threw down their arms, and abandoned their artillery and ammunition, flying in every direction.—Not one of them could have reached the Euphrates had Ibrahim pasha wished seriously to prevent it. The city of Aleppo has petitioned Ibrahim pasha to make arrangements for obliging the disarmed soldiery of Hafiz pasha to recross the Euphrates, in order not to disturb the security we enjoy here.

The few Egyptian troops left here have set out in the direction of the camp. To-morrow or next day the Egyptian advanced guard, commanded by Osman pasha, will commence passing the Euphrates—every thing indicates that such is the intention of the Egyptian seraskier."

This day (July 6) the pasha's despatches the Genoroso and the Egyptian arrived, but we regret to say that they do not bring Ibrahim pasha's despatches. We suppose he thinks his laconic telegraphic despatches to his father, via Damietta, to be sufficient. It ran thus:—"The Turks are dispersed; they have left behind them every thing, besides 6,000 prisoners." By these vessels we learn that 4,000 of the said prisoners have applied to enter the pasha's service. They have been accepted, and transports have been ordered to Scanderoon to bring them. Then they will probably be sent to the Hedjaz and Yemen, to assist in bringing the whole of Arabia under the Egyptian government.

London, July 31. Intelligence has been this day received from India, stating that the British army had entered Candahar on the 21st of April. The difficulties which the army had experienced with respect to provisions had vanished, and they had been received with open arms. Private intelligence from Candahar to April 29, reports that Sha Shoja had been crowned with acclamation, all the chiefs with the exception of the Baulckzye brothers having signified their adherence to him. Dost Mahomed, it is said had sent his family to Bokhara. The British army was to proceed forthwith to Cabool, which it is expected to reach in twenty-two days.

This gratifying intelligence had been received at Peshawur with great rejoicings. The city was illuminated for three days, and preparations were made for the immediate advance of the contingent army of Ruojeet Sing, accompanied by the Shahzade, the major and colonel Wads upon the coast.

The letters received this morning from St. Petersburg, bring two imperial ukases, by which several important changes are made in the Russian currency.

The silver ruble, and its fractional parts, as now in circulation, is henceforth to be recognised as the only legal measure of value.

Liverpool, Monday, July 29. Cotton market.—There has been a good demand throughout the week both from the trade and exporters, and although it has been more freely met by holders within the last few days, yet an advance has been maintained of 1-2d. to 5-3d. on American and 1-4d. per lb. on Brazil and Surat on our last quotations. The sales amount to 41,440 bales, (of which 3,500 American, 130 Pernam, 170 Marannah and 200 Surat are for export, and 3,500 American on speculation), and comprise 290 Sea Island at 20d. to 36d. with 150 stained at 9d. to 12d.; 8,270 Bowed 5 7-8d. to 8 1-2d.; 7,800 Mobile, Alabama, and Tennessee 4d. to 9d.; 14,510 Orleans 6 1-4d. to 10 1-2d.; 2,450 Pernambuco, Paraíba, &c. 8 3-4d. to 9 1-3d.; 1,100 Bahia and Maccio 5d. to 9 1-2d.; 1,450 Maranh 7 7-8d. to 9 1-2d.; 520 Pernambuco 8 to 8 1-4; 100 Lagrira S 3-4; 840 Carthegena 5 1-2 to 6 1-4; 90 common West India 6 3 4 to 9; 420 Egyptian 11 to 13; 3,210 Surat 4 1-4 to 6 1-2; and 150 Madras at 4 7-8 to 5 3-4 per lb. The sales to-day amount to about 3,500 bags, all to the trade. One Manchester house has bought to the extent of 800 bags. The business consists of 400 Pernam at 9 to 9 1-4; 500 Marannah 8 3-4 to 9 1-4; 300 Bahia 8 1-2 to 9 1-4; 200 Egyptian 11 to 12 1-2; 100 Surat 4 1-2 to 5 1-4; the remainder American at 6 1-2 to 8 3-4. Prices compared with the quotations of Friday last, are rather in favor of the buyer. On Saturday 4,000 bags were sold.

Liverpool July 31. Cotton market. The sales of Thursday last were 5,000 bags, Friday 5,000, Saturday 4,000. Monday 3,500, Tuesday 1,500, one-to-day 2,000. There has been a good demand since last week, which holders have met willingly, and cotton is offering plentifully. Prices may be considered as having declined 1-8d. to 1-4d. per lb. in American descriptions since Friday. Brazil and other kinds remain steady. The import of the week amounts to 16,000 bags.

From the Liverpool Mail, Aug. 1st. Exports of cotton yarn and manufactured goods. The quantity of cotton yarn exported in the first six months of 1838 was 53,275,467 lbs.; and the quantity in the first six months of 1839 was 37,239,615 lbs.; decrease 16,033,852 lbs. or about thirty per cent. Decrease in the export to Holland, of 5,435,093 lbs.; to Naples and Sicily of 2,056,813 lbs.; to Russia of 2,432,438 lbs.; to India and China of 2,154,100 lbs.; to Trieste, Venice and Austrian ports, 924,120 lbs.; to Turkey and the Levant 579,730 lbs. There would seem to have been a small increase (115,556 lbs.) to British North America, and a decrease to the United States of 252,759 lbs. being about five-sixths of the whole quantity exported thither. The stock of cotton in Great Britain, on the 25th June last, was estimated at 637,889 bags, equal to the consumption of 32 3-4 weeks, if only 20,000 bags are consumed weekly during the year. Although the price of American cotton was nearly 2d. per lb. higher on the 1st of July last, than at the corresponding date of last year, the average prices of yarn are now rather below those of that period.

Manchester, Friday July 26. Cotton market.—There has been a fair amount of business doing throughout the week both in goods and yarns, and since Tuesday a rather improved demand must be noticed for both articles. The stocks of power-loom cloth are getting low, but of twist they are still thought to be considerable; in proof of which, the tending is, if any thing, to lower rates. The very full prices of this day seemight are readily made for most kinds of power-loom cloth; and in a case of two stocks of some particular goods, viz. 11-2d. advance must be noted. The calico printers are pretty well employed. Low sheetings are saleable at 6d. advance.

CASE OF BOTTEMRY.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

A decision has lately been made in the high court of admiralty in England—the report of which was brought out by the British Queen—the highest importance as respects the relations of British shipping to the rest of the world, and particularly to commercial men in the United States. It was a question as to the validity of a bottomry bond, executed at Philadelphia, by the master of the British ship Vihelia. The vessel sailed from England in April, 1836, for Honduras, where she took in mahogany and other produce, and sailed from Belize, in August, 1837. Having run foul of another vessel, she returned to Belize for repairs, and recommenced her voyage in October, meeting with tempestuous weather, from which the ship suffered much damage, the master was compelled to make for Philadelphia, with six feet water in the hold. Here, being without funds, he placed himself under the direction of the acting British consul, (Mr. Vaughan) and the agent for Lloyd's, (Mr. Jordan) who introduced him to an American merchant, (Mr. Stephen Baldwin). The vessel was surveyed and the cargo landed; the estimate of the cost of repairs was about 7,000 dollars; but, on a subsequent examination, more extensive repairs were found necessary. Unsuccessful attempts having been made to raise money even on bottomry, successive sales of the cargo were resorted to, amounting in the whole to about 15,000 dollars, the total expense of the repairs being 17,045 dollars. The proceeds of the sales were disbursed by Baldwin, with the sanction of the master. The whole proceeds of the cargo became responsible to meet the repairs, Mr. Baldwin became responsible for the balance, and the British consul, with temporary authority for the amount advanced by him, being 10,060 dollars, bearing a maritime interest of 15 per cent. From the opinion of the court, it is to be gathered that when Mr. Baldwin began to make advances, there was no distinct evidence of an original understanding or contract between him and the master that his final bond was to be secured by a botomy bond, but that he probably made his advances, trusting to the general lien which the law of this country gives in such cases, and not at all to the personal credit of the master or owner, and subsequently took the botomy bond. The master, in his affidavit in the cause, deposed that he executed the bond under compulsion. This suggestion was distinctly repudiated in the judgment of Dr. Lushington, who pronounced in favor of the bond.

This decision is important as recognizing and proceeding upon the following principle. It is well known to legal and commercial persons, that by the law of England the party who repairs, or makes advances to repair a foreign ship, has no lien on the ship itself, without an express agreement to that effect; whereas, by the law of most maritime nations, and especially by that of the U. States, such a party has a lien on such a ship, without any agreement. In this case it was considered, in the first place, that, where the question of fact was whether the money was advanced on personal credit or not, the fact of a lien existing by the law of the foreign country, is an ingredient and an important circumstance in ascertaining the true nature of the transaction; that it is important to bear that law in mind, because it shows a state of things which renders botomy more probable, furnishing a strong presumption in favor of botomy and against personal credit. For why should a merchant, without some such consideration, abandon the lien his own law affords him, and trust to the credit of an owner in a foreign country, of whom he knows nothing? In the second place, it was held, that it is competent to the foreign merchant, without any express agreement at all for a botomy bond, to make advances on the security of the ship, that is, on the faith of a lien given by the law of his own country, and that it is not necessary to have a botomy bond, or any agreement for such a bond, till the ship is about to sail. The question is, not whether all the advances were originally advanced from the beginning of the voyage, with a view to a future botomy, but whether any part of the advances or the responsibility was on personal credit. If the money was advanced on personal credit, or if the foreign merchant made himself responsible, looking to personal credit only, in that case the law of lien will never entitle him to convert that which was originally a transaction of personal credit into one of botomy. It is a totally different thing, to convert a transaction from its primary character of personal credit into botomy, and to take a botomy bond where the money was at first advanced on the security of a lien, or right of lien, on the ship.

Although this decision at once commends itself in point of principle, and although there had been cases both in England and in this country, nearly approaching to it, none is recollecting, in which so full and decisive effect has been given to the law of the country of the foreign lender, and the recognition of the entire situation of such a case by the recognition of a British court, when it is directly the reverse of that of a British creditor, is a fresh instance of the cosmopolitan character of maritime jurisprudence?

VISIT TO THE SAULT ST. MARIE.

This outlet to a portion only of the vast body of water of Lake Superior, is a favorite place of resort to those who would pursue the exploration of wild lake scenery, from the lovely town of Mackinaw, through Huron's crystal waters and green isles. The Cleveland (Ohio) Herald gives some beautiful descriptions of a late excursion:

The transparency of the water among the thousand islands, scattered between the Huron and the Sault, excites the admiration of every one. You look into the glassy deep, and the flicker's eye are seen far down mirrored in all their beauty, while the boat seems to float away between them, so perfect is the reflection. The place called Sailor's Encampment, from the circumstance that a party of boatmen from Lake Superior, were here obliged to spend the winter, by sudden frost, is one of surpassing loveliness. Rocky isles, all mossy and green, with low shrubbery, rises from the waters around, and no less than seven channels, like broad bands of silver, shoot out in various directions from this point. The Indians have a few lodges on one of the most central islands, and their light canoes were seen darting like arrows on the rolling wavelets the Lexington left for many yards in her wake. The notes of our band echoed from island to island, and gently died away among the hills rising in majesty on the horizon. The sky was clouded, and a dreamy haziness seemed to settle on the hill tops, diffusing a softened coloring of azure, luxuriant as Indian summer, over wilds and waters. A fairy land, truly, but as we floated through Lake George, and entered the mountain defile, where the St. Mary has torn a passage, to swell the volume of the lower lakes, from the vast fountain of Superior, the solitary, the rugged, the magnificent prevailed. In comparative silence we passed through this high temple of creative power, until a symphony to the eternal anthem of Niagara fell on the ear, and the sparkling waters of the Sault was described in the perspective, tossing foam-wreaths to heaven.

The Sault is a cascade of only 27 feet, presenting a living sheet of foam of about a mile in length and breadth. Vast fragments of rocks, consisting of granite and hornblend, lie embedded in the stream, which, opposed to the currents of the rapids, scatter its foam around the maple, the pine, the hemlock, and the elm, mingled in green forests upon its banks. The canoes of the Indian engaged in fishing, which are seen playing around the foot of the falls, and the distant mountains of Lake Superior, all stand like mighty battlements on the horizon, impress the scenery with a character of solitary grandeur.

A band of the great Chippewa tribe, scattered from Montreal along the boundary waters for some three thousand miles toward the north west, reside at the Sault. During the warm months they follow fishing as chief business, and in winter take enough through the ice for subsistence. They push their bark canoes with great dexterity into the turbulent flood, and fearlessly scoop out the silver white fish from the midst of the cataract. The canoe is managed by an Indian standing erect in the bow and another in the stern, the one in the bow having a net fastened to the end of a light pole deposited on the edge of the canoe.

Not infrequently more than one fish is brought up at a dip, and from three to three hundred are taken by two fishermen in a day. These are sold fresh to the packers—eighty white fish of common size making a barrel. Some forty barrels are taken daily at the Sault at this season of the year. The fish caught now are only of medium size—the largest and best being in the spring and fall run.

Most of the Sault Indians are members of the Baptist, Methodist or Catholic societies, and the Sabbath was very generally observed by them as a day of rest. Not a fishing bark was seen in the rapids, and such is the influence of the reigning chief, that a violation of his command in this respect would be visited by a breaking up of the canoe of the offender by the whole band. The rev. Mr. Bingham officiates in English at the Baptist mission school room, a half breed interpreter following him in the Chippewa tongue. Half breeds, mainly French Canadians, form a large proportion of the population at the Sault, and the French and Indian language are principally spoken.

We were first met at the Sault a large party of the wildest of the wild men—Blackbird and his band from Lapoint 450 miles across Lake Superior. They are a large, stalwart and exceedingly muscular race—half naked, painted and ornamented with trinkets, claws of beasts, talons of birds, feathers, stuffed skins and every thing hideous and grotesque in nature. They had never before seen a steambot, and with true Indian stoicism, after the first look of wonder they appeared careless and indifferent. The government interpreter, an intelligent and communicative half breed, informed us that they were not really so, but that they looked upon the boat as the work of the Great Spirit—that every part exposed to view was closely noted—and that the wonderful fire ship would form the theme of many a talk at their future feasts and dances. Towards evening they were invited on board the boat to give a dance. Some thirty appeared, nearly naked, armed, painted and disfigured as horribly as imagination can conceive. They were preceded by Blackbird and two or three Indians, who were bearing instruments of parchment stretched upon a hoop, something like a drum head. The braves of Blackbird are famous warriors, being constantly engaged in contests with the Sioux of the prairies. Their dance was in truth the pow-wow of nature's wildest and least tutored children.

Going over the falls. A single canoe will carry down safely some fifteen or twenty persons. The Indians require passengers to sit quietly on the bottom of the canoe, while they stand erect in the bow and stern so as to steer through the intricate channel. The canoe shoots along swift as an arrow, rising and plunging in the mad waters as if about to rush to certain destruction on the rocks round which the spray is tossing, but the calm savages spring on their sitting poles as the rocks are neared, and the canoe darts by them in safety. On such occasions the canoe not unfrequently takes a splash of water, so furiously breaks the circumambient foam and brown up by the seething waters, the dusky waterman set up a yell, as the foot of the rapids are safely reached, a shout in which you can scarcely refrain from joining, so wild and terrible is the "chaff of waters," to look back upon.

The Indian canoe is very light and buoyant, constructed of birch bark, ingeniously and secretly ribbed, lined and strengthened with timber. Manned by ten Indians, the usual complement of rowers, they bound forward at the rate of about six miles an hour. So light and naturally do the paddles strike the water, that an Indian will pull for hours without apparent fatigue, the labor being lightened and the speed increased by the frequent who-ah! who-ah! who-ah! of the party corresponding to the hurrah of our language. A more spirited or romantic regretta cannot be got up, than a fleet of canoes thus manned, the broad blades of the paddles tossing the sparkling waters in the sunshine, and all working with the regularity and precision of machinery. Add to this the painted leures and grotesque ornaments of the half naked savages, and a tout ensemble of the wild and fanciful is perfected. Most of the chiefs and sub-chiefs possess a small flag of the United States which they proudly unfold from the stern of their canoes on their aquatic excursions.

SINGULAR MOVEMENT IN BENGAL.

The world seems really to be turned upside down now-a-days. Old things are becoming new with incredible celerity. Every foreign arrival brings us something to wonder at, till at length we have ceased to wonder at all. We have ceased also both to believe and to disbelieve. Nothing surprises us, but we take things as they come, and wait patiently for confirmation or contradiction, as the case may be; it seems quite a matter of indifference or chance to us how it turns out. So much for living in these days of the world's renovation, and especially in this focus of all human or inhuman excitement, the United States of America. The last great story which we honored with our usual editorial attention, and no more, came out in the religious papers a week or two since—being news brought by a late steamer [as usual]. It related to a strange revolution said to have occurred among the Hindoos, near Alshnaghur, one of the stations of the church missionary society, about 70 miles north of Calcutta. It was stated that in 55 villages, extending for sixty miles along the Jenagha, more than three thousand Hindoos had thrown away their idols within a few months, and expressed a desire to be admitted into the Christian church; a movement for which the day of Pentecost itself would apparently furnish the only precedent we have.

What is more strange, however, this rumor would seem to be true. The confirmations of it are too strong to be gaisayed or denied.—We have the regular reports of the rev. archdeacon Dealtry of the church, a personage of the highest repute, who visited the villages at the request of the lord bishop (Wilson) of Calcutta, for the purpose of learning the truth.—On ascertaining this, the bishop himself entered with his whole soul into the matter, and wrote to London, to the directors of the church missionary society, urging the sending of between 30 and 40 additional clergymen, school masters and catechists, into this field. He says,—"If we can but enter at the wide and effectual door—in time, not only these 3,000 or 4,000, but the whole population of the fifty or sixty villages may receive the Christian faith, and resemble our Christian villages in the times of our Anglo Saxon forefathers in the 6th and 7th centuries. Such a glorious scene has never yet been presented to our longing eyes in Bengal."

All this, with a long elaborate letter, full of details, is addressed to the earl of Chichester, president of the church missionary society, and appears to have created in England a strong sensation. The bishop appeals very forcibly to the universities for aid. He says he shall make a tour of confirmation in the autumn, to the extent of 3,000 miles, with the view of visiting the new Christians. Some attempts are made to explain the origin of this great movement, but it seems to us at this distance, that they must be accounted for by other than proximate causes. Powerful influences, tending to such results, have long been at work in the east, especially under British sway. Missionary influence is one of these, but only one. Those who would have a more extended view of them all must consult many authorities. They must study the whole history of British India. Mr. Malcolm, in his travels, throws much light on the subject. He anticipates that Buddhism will at no very remote period be generally abandoned, silently and slowly overgrown, as it were by European civilization and the Christian religion.

MR. WEBSTER'S SPEECH.

The first triennial celebration of the National Agricultural Society was held at Oxford on the 18th of July. Earl Spencer presided. At the dinner nearly 3,000 persons sat down to table, under an immense awning. Many good toasts and speeches were elicited, from among which we select the remarks of Mr. Webster.

The chairman, (earl Spencer), in giving the next toast, said they had already drunk the health of a foreign minister who was present, but they had the honor and advantage of having among them other foreigners not employed in any public capacity, who had come among them for the purpose of seeing a meeting of English farmers, such as he believed never had been witnessed before, but which he hoped might often be seen again. Among these foreigners was one gentleman of a most distinguished character from the United States of America, [cheers], that great country whose people we were obliged legally to call foreigners, but who were still our brethren in blood. [Loud cheers].

It was most gratifying to him that such a man had been present at that meeting, that he might know what the farmers of England really were, and be able to report to his fellow citizens the manner in which they were united, from every class, in promoting their peaceful and most important objects. He gave, "The health of Mr. Webster, and other distinguished strangers." The toast was received with much applause.

Mr. Webster said the notice which the noble earl at the head of the table had been kind enough to take of him, and the friendly sentiments which he had seen fit to express toward the country to which he belonged, demanded his most cordial acknowledgments. He should, therefore, begin by saying how gratified he had been in having it in his power to pass one day among the proprietors, the cultivators, the farmers of old England—[cheers]—that England of which he had been reading and conversing all his life, and now for once had the pleasure of visiting. [Loud cheers].

He would say, in the next place—if he could say—how much he had been pleased and gratified with the exhibition of one product, or branch of product, of that agriculture for which England was so justly distinguished. When persons connected with some pursuit, of whatever description, assembled in such numbers, he could not but look on them with respect and regard; but he confessed at once that he was more than ordinarily moved on all such occasions, when he saw before him a great assemblage of those whose interests, whose hopes, whose objects and pursuits were connected on either continent with the cultivation of the soil. [Loud cheers].

Whatever else might tend to enrich and beautify society, that which feeds and clothes comfortably the great mass of mankind should always be considered as being regarded as the great foundation of national interest. He need not say that the agriculture of England was instructive to all the world; as a science it was here better understood; as an art it was here better practised; as a great interest it was here as highly esteemed as in any other part of the globe. [Cheers].

The importance of agriculture to a nation was obvious to every man; but it perhaps did not strike every mind so suddenly, although certainly it was equally true, that the annual product of English agriculture was a great concern to the whole civilized world. [Cheers.] The civilized and commercial states were so connected, their interests were so blended, that it was a matter of notoriety, that the fear or the prospect of a short crop in England deranged and agitated the business transactions and commercial regulations and speculations of the whole world.

It was natural that this should be the case in those nations which looked to the occurrence of a short crop in England, as an occasion which may enable them to dispose profitably of their own surplus produce; but the fact went much farther, for when there was such an occurrence in the English capital, the centre of commercial speculations for the whole world, where the price of commodities was settled and arranged, where the exchanges between nations were conducted and concluded, its consequences were felt every where, as none knew better than the noble earl who occupied the chair.

Should there be a frost in England fifteen days later than usual, should there be an unseasonable drought, or ten cold and wet days instead of ten warm and dry ones, when the harvest should be reaped, every exchange in Europe and America felt the consequence of it. He would not pursue these remarks. [Loud cries of "go on, go on."] He must, however, say that he entertained not the slightest doubt of the great advantage to the interests of agriculture which must result from the formation and operation of this society.

Was it not obvious to the most common observer that those who cultivated the soil had not the same conveniences, opportunities and facilities of daily intercourse and comparison of opinions as the commercial and manufacturing interests? (Cheers.) Those who are associated in the pursuits of commerce and manufactures naturally congregated together in cities; they had immediate means of frequent communication. Their sympathies, feelings and opinions were instantaneously circulated like electricity through the whole body.

But how was it with the cultivators of the soil. Separated, spread over a thousand fields, each attentive to his own acres, they had only occasional opportunities of communicating with each other. If, among commercial men, chambers of commerce and other institutions of that character, if, among the trades, guilds were found expedient, how much more necessary and advisable to have some such institutions, which at least annually should bring together the representatives of the great agricultural interests? (Cheers.)

In many parts of the country to which he belonged, there were societies upon a similar principle, and they were so far from being very advantageous. They had rewards for specimens of fine animals; they had rewards for implements of husbandry, supposed to excel those which had been known before. They turned their attention to every thing supposed to facilitate the operations of the farmer, and improve his stock and interest in the country. Among other means of improving agriculture, they had imported largely from the best breeds of animals known in England. (Cheers.)

He knew that a gentleman who had to-day deservedly obtained many prizes for stock would not be displeased to learn that he had seen along the rich pastures of the Ohio and its tributary streams animals raised from those which had been furnished by his farms in Yorkshire and Northumberland. (Cheers.) But, apart from this subject, he must be allowed to make a short response to the very kind sentiments, which went near to his heart, as uttered by the noble earl at the head of the table.

Their noble chairman was pleased to speak of the people of the United States as kindered in blood with the people of England. (Cheers.) "I," continued the honorable gentleman, "am an American." (Cheers.) I was born on that great continent, and I am wedded to the fortunes of my country, for weal or for woe. (Loud cheers.) There is no other region of the earth which I can call my country. (Cheers.) But I know and am proud to know, what blood flows in these veins. (Cheers.)

I am happy to stand here to-day and to remember, although my ancestors for several generations lie buried beneath the soil of the western continent, yet there has been a time when my ancestors and your ancestors toiled in the same cities and villages, (cheers), cultivated adjacent fields, (cheers), and worked together to build up that great structure of civil polity which has made England what England is. (Cheers.)

When I was about to embark, some friends asked me what I was going to England for. To be sure, gentlemen, I came for no object of business, public or private; but I told them it was coming to see the elder branch of the family. (Loud cheers.) I told them I was coming to see my distant relations—(cheers)—my kith and kin of the old Saxon race. (Loud cheers.)

With regard to whatsoever is important to the peace of the world, its prosperity, the progress of knowledge and of just opinions, the diffusion of the sun's light of christianity—(loud cheers)—I know nothing more important to the promotion of those best interests of humanity and the cause of the general peace, amity, and concord, than the good feeling subsisting between the Englishmen on this side of the Atlantic and the descendants of Englishmen on the other. (Cheers.)

Some little clouds have overhung our horizon—I trust they will soon pass away. I am sure that the age we live in does not expect that England and America are to have controversies carried to the extreme upon any occasion not of the last importance to national interests and honor. (Cheers.)

We live in an age when nations as well as individuals are subject to a moral responsibility (cheers). Neither government nor people—thank God for it—can now trifle with the general cause of the civilized world, (cheers), and I am sure that the civilized world would hold your country and my country to a very strict account, if, without very plain and apparent reason, deeply affecting the independence and best interests of the nation, any controversy between them should have other than an amicable issue. (Cheers.)

I will venture to say that each country has intelligence enough to understand all that belongs to its just rights, and is not deficient in means to maintain them, (cheers), and if any controversy between England and America were to be pushed to the extreme of force, neither party would or could have any signal advantage over the other, except what it could find in the justness of its cause and the approbation of the world. (Loud cheers.)

With respect to the occasion which has called us together, I beg to repeat the gratification which I have felt in passing a day among such a company, and conclude with the most fervent expression of my wish for the prosperity and usefulness of the Agricultural Society of England. (Loud cheers),

ANTI-SLAVERY.

LETTER FROM ROGER SHERMAN.

Riverfield, June 26, 1838.

GENTLEMEN: I received your letter of the 20th instmt, inviting me to attend the national anti-slavery convention to be held at Albany, and requesting my views on the subject, if I should be unable to attend.

It is much to be regretted that an object so dear to humanity, and so important to our national honor, as the abolition of slavery in the U. States, is not pursued in a manner more conducive to its accomplishment than has hitherto been adopted by the anti-slavery society. There are reasons to doubt the benevolence or integrity of its members; but the maxims of wisdom may be violated by rashness of virtuous zeal, as really as by the waywardness of a corrupted mind—however differently they may be viewed by the casuist—and sufferings, unintentionally inflicted or prolonged by the errors of a friend, may be as intense as if caused by the malice of an enemy. That emancipation can never be effected in the slave states but by voluntary enactments of their own legislatures, or by successful resistance on the part of the slaves, is often admitted in your publications, and the latter course you must justly decry. Thus the declaration of the anti-slavery society, convened at Philadelphia in December, 1833, in contrasting the revolutionary struggle of our fathers, for national liberty, with that which your society are making in behalf of the slave, expressly says that "their principles led them to wage war against their oppressors, and to spill human blood like water, in order to be free. Ours forbid the doing of evil that good may come, and lead us to reject, and to entreat the oppressed to reject, the use of all carnal weapons for deliverance from bondage."

The same declaration, in regard to the power of the several states, has this language: "We fully and unanimously recognize the sovereignty of each state to legislate exclusively on the subject of the slavery which is tolerated within its limits." Both these just opinions are still more forcibly announced in your "Address to the Public," of the 3d of September, 1835. Now it is well known that slavery exists only by force of municipal law; and can never be abolished, by those which you allow to be the only admissible means of its abolition, until those who enact the laws shall voluntarily restore to the oppressed negro the liberty to which all men are entitled. How is this to be accomplished? By what means can slave owners be induced to consent to the manumission of their slaves? Until that consent is obtained, the slave, as you admit, will be held in bondage. Can you discern that any progress has been made toward this most desirable result by the means which you have hitherto adopted? Do the people of the southern states manifest a disposition to yield the point, or begin to listen to your persuasions, as if their minds were approaching toward conviction? On the contrary, since the institution of the anti-slavery society, have they not more closely riveted the chains of the unhappy African? Are not the privileges of the slaves for acquiring instruction, and attaining intellectual and moral elevation, much abridged within the last few years? Not long since, the question of gradual emancipation was gravely debated in the legislatures of some of the principal southern states.

The philanthropist began to rejoice in the anticipation of measures similar to those which have restored liberty to the colored population of the north. But recently, even among the people of the free states, a spirit has existed, from some cause, against the course adopted by the anti-slavery society, which has manifested keener bitterness, and exhibited more open violence, than was ever excited in this country, against any efforts for moral reformation. What is the feature in the proceedings of the friends of emancipation which has caused this unprecedented excitement in the free states, and laid in slumber, or excited into violent reaction, the incipient sentiments of liberty which were felt at the south? Our northern people have erred, with few, if any exceptions, in disapproving of slavery. They have no interest in its continuance. It is wholly abhorrent to the principles which they have been taught to cherish. In the days of our fathers, when it was abolished at the north, every class of the community, except, perhaps, a few of the slaveholders, favored its abolition. At the south, many of the most distinguished men concurred in our sentiments, and addresses of unrivalled eloquence were made in favor of emancipation, in the midst of powerful slaveholders. Witness that of the celebrated Pinkney, in Maryland, more than half a century ago. Why is it that the late exertions in this holy cause have met, both at the north and south, the most determined, and often the most lawless resistance? And why has open violence been unjustifiably winked at and tolerated by a great mass of our respectable citizens, and even by the officers of the law? Either the people of the whole nation have undergone a change of sentiment and character, in regard to the great evil of slavery, or the manner of operations has been most unhappily erroneous. As the change of public feeling occurred soon after the commencement of the publications and other proceedings of those who originated the organized anti-slavery associations, I think that change has resulted from those proceedings. The peculiar feature, which, as I apprehend, has caused them to delect their own object, is the extreme and intemperate zeal by which they are distinguished. Not only the slaveholders, but the ministers of religion, and all others who do not partake of this characteristic peculiarity, are proscribed, and spoken of in language of reproach.

Could it be supposed that a people so high spirited as the slaveholders of the south could be cowed into compliance by bitter reproaches? Had the Rev. doctor Edwards, and others who publicly espoused the measures of emancipation adopted in Connecticut soon after the revolutionary war, called slaveholders MAN-STEALERS, in starting capitals, as is done at the declaration of a convention at Philadelphia, to which we have before alluded, would it not have excited, in the northern Yankee, more of resentment than conviction, and less of compliance than opposition? The southern people have felt, and, to a great degree, justly, that the abolitionists of the north were addressing their fears, and not merely their understanding or consciences. They have been addressed in terms of abominable crimination, rarely softened by the language of respect. This has made them inaccessible; has wrought up a temper which resists conviction or favorable influence, and has, I fear, put off emancipation for at least half a century beyond the period when it might have been effected; and excluded from the slaves those moral and religious influences which were conducive to their present and future good. This manner of addressing the public on these subjects can never result in the good which is honestly intended, but must continue to render less and less hopeful, the great objects of your sincere endeavors. Could missionary, thus addressing civilized heathens, hope for a favorable audience?

If the whole north are united in the course in which the abolitionists are now pursuing, it would have no tendency to overcome the opposition of the south. It might dissolve our national union—which you profess, and I trust, with sincerity, to appreciate according to its inestimable worth—but would only aggravate the aversion of the south to a measure which they will never adopt from coercion, unless by a servile insurrection, which your society so pointedly depreciate. I think, too, that the American anti-slavery society is not only aggravating the condition of the slave, and converting his hopes into dark despair; but the free negroes are suffering under the prejudice and party spirit which its intemperance has engendered. Party spirit entrenches the soul, and fortifies both head and heart, against reason and moral influence. That society is also endangering the peace and stability of the United States, by making a participation in their excesses, practically, if not in form, a term of communion. Indeed their seems to be no interest of primary importance in our country, political or religious, which is not put in jeopardy by the honest men who are embarked in this benevolent, but unwise and disastrous enterprise, as it is now conducted. I respect their motives while I deplore their errors. Humanity, patriotism and piety long to see their ultimate end accomplished, but weep over the desolation which marks their course.

Your society, gentlemen, embraces many whose names I venerate, and not a few of my personal and highly respected friends. As you requested my sentiments, I could do no less than give them with plainness and sincerity. I trust, although I cannot hope for your concurrence, that you will do the same justice to my motives which I have done to yours. If any of the subjects are correct, the convention which I have called, can do no good to the slaves or to the country, unless they advise to an abandonment of the errors which have hitherto characterized the anti-slavery society. I am, gentlemen, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ROGER M. SHERMAN.

LETTER FROM LEIGH

ON THE SUB-TREASURY SCHEME.
From the Richmond Whig of Aug. 20.

VIEWS OF A SOUND AND ENLIGHTENED REPUBLICAN.

The subjoined letter of Mr. Leigh will attract public attention. It is one of the best productions we have seen from the pen of that great and zealous advocate of constitutional freedom. It gives utterance to sentiments in relation to the money power, which must command the hearty approval of every man who is a republican in principle—who is in favor of a divorce of the purse and the sword, and opposed to an absolute executive.

The views of Mr. L. on this great and vital subject, are those which were entertained by the champions of English freedom—by the Hampdens, Sydneys and Russells—which were adopted by the framers of our institutions—for which Washington and his immortal compatriots fought and triumphed; and they are the views which, when a majority of the people of this country shall cease to cower and enforce in the administration of the government, that government will cease to be a blessing. But Mr. L. expresses his sentiments with such cogency and eloquence, that their force will be but weakened by any comments from us.

Mr. Leigh's opinion of Mr. Van Buren's sub-treasury scheme.

The following is an extract of a letter written by Benjamin Watkins Leigh, esq. to a gentleman in Mecklenburg, dated the 29th October, 1838, on the publication of which, Mr. Leigh, at the request of the gentleman to whom it was addressed, has given his consent.

In transmitting this extract for publication, our correspondent says:

"In favor of the sub-treasury myself,—at least of the great principle of 'divorce.'—I frequently, in arguing that question with my friends previous to the reception of Mr. Leigh's letter, (when appealing to the authority of distinguished names) mentioned him as a friend to the sub-treasury scheme also, from my recollection of his speech at Petersburg, and a letter addressed by him some short time before Mr. Pleasants and other gentlemen of Richmond. Being convinced by his letter that I had done him injustice in this respect, and that his opinions on this subject (as far as my information extended) were very generally misunderstood, I conceived it to be an act of justice to himself and his many friends that his real opinions should be known."

I can hardly explain my opinions on the question of the sub-treasury, in the compass of a letter. The sub-treasury system I spoke of in my speech at Petersburg, was an organization of treasuries and treasurers at various points in the union, all connected with the general treasury at Washington, and under the direction of the treasurer there, and of the secretary of the treasury, while all the treasurers general and subordinate, and the secretary of the department, should be held directly responsible to congress—that is, accountable, each and every one, when called upon, to account directly to congress, and not indirectly through the president. It was an essential principle of such a system, that the public treasure should be in the custody of congress, regulated entirely by law, and that the president should have no share, as constitutionally he was entitled to no share in the custody, any more than in the disposition of it, save what was entrusted to him by law. Now Mr. Van Buren's sub-treasury system is based upon the assumption that the custody of the public treasure should be, de facto, by the executive, because, forsooth, the executive has the appointment and removal of all officers appointed for the custody and administration of the treasure, and the sub-treasury bill seemed only intended to recognize by law the president's constitutional right of custody of the public money, and to regulate the details of the system so as to endue the executive right of custody with the utmost possible degree of executive influence; and the bill, moreover, pointed out its obvious consequences to that same EXECUTIVE BANK, which general Jackson was willing to furnish congress a scheme of, if he had been consulted, and which if the sub-treasury bill should ever become a law, will, in a very few years I am confident, be openly proposed and adopted. I shall never acknowledge, either directly or indirectly, or by any manner of indirection or implication, that the president has, by the constitution, any right whatever to any sort of custody of the public treasure, or any duty or power in respect to it, save what may be given to or imposed on him by law, and modified or taken away from him by law. Sooner, much sooner, than admit this new, and till general Jackson's time, unheard of, claim to a constitutional right in the president, which the law cannot deprive him of, to the custody of all public money, I will vote for an hereditary monarchy; for the claim, if admitted and acted on, must lead to monarchy, and to the worst of monarchies, by the worst, though by far the easiest of all conceivable roads; by the road of general corruption, worked by executive influence on the money concerns of the nation, exercised for executive purposes. It is in vain to talk of hard money currency, (since, it is morally impossible to accomplish the object) so long as the states have, and exercise the power of creating banks, and that without the least stint or moderation. It is a moral law which can no more be controlled than any physical law of nature, that if there be two currencies in any country, that which is cheapest and least valuable will soon exclude that which is dearest and most valuable. So far as I am informed, Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Benton are the only prominent statesmen in the public councils who go for the hard money currency, and they differ in this, that the former is for a hard money currency only in the money operations of the government, the latter is for it in all the transactions of the community.

The great body of the administration party stop far short of them both—and hence it was that they castrated the sub-treasury bill of Mr. Calhoun's hard money clause. The party opposed to the administration seem destined to be forever weakened by divisions among themselves, that proceeds from their giving infinitely greater importance to the few questions on which they differ, than to those on which they agree. The ministerial party have never any innumerable disagreements—they unite in the same general purpose, and disregard all other objects, or differences of opinion; and that general purpose is the security of the public power in the officers of hands, and with it the economy and enlightenment of the sub-treasury system has afforded a singular exemplification. When I mentioned that system in my speech at Petersburg, it was reprobated by the whole ministerial party, and particularly by their chief organ the Globe, as a system which would give an uncontrollable monarchical influence to the executive, and upon the principle they assumed, and still assume, and which seems now hardly to be contested; but which I then denied and still strenuously deny. They were right; the principles, namely, that the president has a constitutional right, inprescriptible by law, to the custody of the public money.

But now, the ministerial party, still holding the same principles as to the inherent constitutional power of the executive, and desiring to act on that principle, are strenuously upholding the president in his sub-treasury scheme; and even those who are opposed to that particular scheme, (witness Mr. Calhoun and the oppositio, &c.), are still the friends of the administration and the executive partisans of the president. On the other hand, Mr. Calhoun, if I rightly understand him, maintains in effect, that the sub-treasury is the question—the great question—the only question of any moment—the question that absorbs all others, and that by which every man's claims to public confidence ought to be tested; and if he does not (and I believe he does not) profess to give his positive support to the administration, and his positive approbation and co-operation to the re-election of Mr. Van Buren, he discountenances all opposition, and damns without reserve any and every competitor that has been named, or has any chance of being nominated by the opposition. The difference between not giving a zealous positive support to Mr. Van Buren, and maintaining a zealous positive opposition to all Mr. Van Buren's opponents or competitors, is not worth counting. Joining Mr. Van Buren on this single question, he abandons the principle of the opposition on every other, especially on the question of the succession. And the public journals friendly to Mr. Calhoun (those of them that I have seen) are pouring such torrents of abuse on the whole opposition party, as are not surpassed by the columns of the Globe or Enquirer. Now, I can readily understand how any man should like the sub-treasury with all the faults of the assumed principle on which it is now rested, and all the vices of its details—that is, prefer it to the unhappy state bank deposit system, which has failed so deplorably—and nevertheless, be as heartily opposed to Mr. Van Buren's re-election as ever. But if this be the ground Mr. Calhoun means to take, I do not understand him, and he is very generally misunderstood. With the opinion I entertain of Mr. Calhoun, and my personal feelings towards him, I grieve to think that I must consider him as a supporter of Mr. Van Buren's re-election. The next election to the presidency is, in my opinion, the great question that absorbs all others.

If Mr. Van Buren and his party cannot be turned out of power—if the doctrine on which that party acts—if the principle by which it is cemented—that "the spoils belong to the victors"—shall be approved and established—if the principle of perpetuating power in the hands of those who hold it, shall still be avowed (as now it is), practised and tolerated—if it shall not be signally rebuked and condemned—then will this government be no longer a blessing, but a curse. I am for Mr. Clay—for him with all my heart. If I differed with him on more and more important points than I do, (and I differ from him on many), I should still most zealously support him against Mr. Van Buren. My opinion, or rather my knowledge of his temper and feelings, leads me to prefer him at this particular conjuncture of affairs, more than I should in almost any other state of things that I can conceive. If he shall be placed in power, he will not only forgive, but he will forget his enemies. He possesses the virtue of generosity (I use the word in its largest sense) in a higher degree than any other man I know. But I will vote for any respectable man whom the opposition shall concur in nominating.

I shall sacrifice all minor considerations and preferences to the great object. I had not the least design, when I took pen in hand, to write any such long letter; but it shall go without revision or alteration.

I remain, with all regard, your obedient servant,
B. W. LEIGH.

MR. WALKER'S LETTER.

Natchez, June 24, 1829.

GENTLEMEN: Your communication of the 25th ultimo, has been received, declaring that the determination announced in my late letter to retire from public life at the end of my present term, is calculated to produce division and probably defeat in the ranks of the democracy of Mississippi. Having been apprised of the great importance in my health since the date of my late letter, you ask me in consonance with the wishes avowed by the democratic press and party of this state, to review my determination, as heretofore expressed, and request me to become a candidate for re-election to the senate of the United States. From your statements, and other concurring testimony, my mind is brought reluctantly to the conclusion, that, from no merits of mine, but from peculiar circumstances existing at this period, my refusal to become a candidate for re-election, might result, as you anticipated, in a division in relation to the question of my successor, injurious to the prospects of the democratic party in this state. To the democracy of Mississippi I am under obligations beyond the power of language to express. By them I have been elevated to my present station, and by the cheering voice of their approval, sustained amidst panics and pressures, in every vote throughout my entire course, in the senate of the United States. For such a party, there is no honorable sacrifice which I am unwilling to make. Actuated then by these motives, I yield, at your request, my own wishes and determination, as heretofore expressed, and consent to become a candidate for re-election. My health, it is true, has continued greatly to improve since the date of my former communication, and my medical advisers now indulge strong and well-founded hopes of a complete restoration. Whether these hopes may be darkened by again consenting to embark in public life, I leave in the hands of a benignant Providence, conscious that there is no cause in which I could fall with greater honor, than in endeavoring to promote the ascendancy of that great and glorious party, which since manhood has received my first and every vote, and whose principles are inseparably united with the perpetuity of our free institutions.

The present period, as you justly observe, is one of great and momentous interest, and the question truly is, whether this shall be a government of the banks or of the people. If the bill to organize an independent constitutional treasury is again and permanently defeated, if the alliance between bank and state is re-established, if banks, state or national, are again created the only keepers and disbursers of the public money, and all the operations of the general government are made to depend upon their will, we shall already have sunk into despotism. A government of one bank or of a thousand banks is not a government of the people, and the effort now made to ascertain the position, that the officers of the banking institutions, neither selected or removable by nor responsible to the people, are the only individuals to whom can safely be entrusted the guardianship of the public money, is an insolvent and aristocratic demand, a false, arrogant, and despotic pretension, which denies the virtue and intelligence of the people, which denies the capacity of the people to select faithful and competent officers to administer the public revenues, and claims for the banks, together with their other exclusive privileges, a monopoly of all the virtue and intelligence, as well as of all the money and power of the country. If the banks should be entrusted with the sole power of appointing their officers, the keepers and disbursers of the public moneys, why not permit them also to select all the officers of the general government, including the secretary of the treasury? Why not permit them, upon the same principles, to dispense altogether with a president of the people and a senate and house of representatives, and through the medium of a self-constituted, a self-renewable and irresponsible bank directory, to direct and control, in secret conclave, all the operations of the government. And under what circumstances is this extraordinary demand by the banks now made for the use and custody of the public money? It is made at a period when the public money has reduced to bankruptcy by the involvement of the banks, and when they failed, in the possession of more than twenty millions of the public money, which they unjustly withheld from the creditors of the nation, a large portion of which has never yet been refunded. If, under circumstances so disgraceful to themselves, so ruinous to the country, the banks have demanded the use and custody of all the public money, and the disbursement of all the revenue of the nation in their depreciated paper, what will they not demand, if reorganized under the direction and control of a great northern central bank of fifty millions? And what will it avail us to strike down the flag of state sovereignty, and to capitulate disgracefully to one paper master instead of a thousand? In both cases, the army of incorporated banks to which we would be asked to surrender, would be the same, but in the last contingency, this army clothed in the panoply of state credit and privileges, and a pecuniary total of four hundred millions of dollars, would be infinitely more dangerous and irresistible, headed and organized, controlled and directed as it would be, by a great central bank with a capital of fifty millions.—Such would be the control of such a bank, even with less capital and power, as declared officially by its late most able and distinguished president, [Mr. Biddle], that the state banks would only exist by its forbearance. By whose forbearance then would they be engulfed and consolidated in the vortex of this great and all-attracting centripetal power? This bank would not only control, as is claimed by its partisans, all the vast incorporated moneyed power and capital of the country, it would not only control and direct the custody, use and disbursement of all public moneys, but the very existence of the general government would be dependent upon its will. At one blow, it could crush for a time the government of the union, or reduce it to a disgraceful capitulation, to the control and subordination of the government of the banks. Nor is it the general government only and the banks of the state that would be controlled by such an institution. Not all the money and property, all the pursuits and industry of the people would be subject to the undisputed control of this gigantic power. The value of all the property of every citizen, and the profits of his business and labor, the price of the very garments that were worn, and the bread that was consumed in every mansion, would be changed and regulated at pleasure by such an institution. Possessed of the sole power and prerogative of manufacturing at pleasure a national currency, clothed with the sovereign attribute of making the only paper money receivable for public dues, controlling and regulating all the state banks and all the vast incorporated moneyed capital of the country, and with the custody, use and disbursement of the public moneys, who does not know that by large emissions and boundless loans of its paper at one time, and an sudden contractions and curtailments at another, it could hold a suffering people as completely within its grasp as is the expiring victim writhing in his agonies within the merciless crushing embrace of a Boa Constrictor. If a particular section of the union, or branch of industry become obnoxious to this mighty power, it could embarrass or crush them at its pleasure. And who would control this gigantic corporation? Not the people or their representatives—for it is a bank created to endure for a generation; placed above and beyond the people by an irrevocable charter: choosing annually its own officers by the votes only of its own stockholders; far removed from any control but that of its own sovereign and despotic will and power. And not only should we ask by whom is this great corporation to be controlled, but where is it to be located? Is it in the south or southwest?—Is it at St. Louis or Louisville—at Nashville or Natchez—at New Orleans or Mobile—at Charleston or Richmond, that it is proposed to locate this great institution? Not but in the midst of the brokers and speculators, the bankers and stockjobbers of Wall street, New York; and not a vote north of Maryland can be obtained for any southern or south western location. And why is this! It is a struggle for a moneyed as well as political power—a struggle to fix and change at pleasure the value of all our property and labor, and of their products;—to regulate and control the banks and commerce of the whole country; and by the substitution of sales of national bank paper, in place of cotton bales—and by the creation thus of exchangeable values throughout the union, in place of our exports, to divert our trade from its natural channels, and consolidate the whole at the point where the great northern monopoly shall reign in its marble palace, supreme and triumphant. Is the south less intelligent than the north, that from the organization of the government we ever have been made to be considered by the northern brethren incompetent to manage a great national bank? I am opposed to a national bank at any point; but if created at all, it ought to be at the point where are the exports of the country; and where the imports ought to be, were we not deprived of them by the unjust interference of the national legislature, by creating and substituting in the business and trade of the country, other exchangeable values in the shape of bank paper.

The northern democracy desire to subject their southern brethren to no such oppression. They are, as Mr. Jefferson declared, "the natural allies of the south"; they are for equal rights; they are opposed to banks and tariffs, and all other monopolies, and headed by that patriot statesman, Martin Van Buren, who in his noble casting vote against Mr. Clay in the senate, in 1836, in favor of Mr. Calhoun's bill for suppressing the distribution of incendiary abolition documents through the mail, and by his own personal efforts, as well as by the assistance of his fanatics, had trampled abolition beneath the feet of a grateful people. Nor have I any admiration on this subject for Mr. Clay, whose votes and opinions upon this question had always heretofore been temporizing or against us, but who came in at the eleventh hour, late at the last session, and performed what is now hailed by his advocates as a great exploit, in stripping the poisonous skin from the putrefying corpse of the dead monster, and flourishing it in presidential triumph over our heads in the senate chamber, as the proud trophy of a noble and glorious achievement. The conversion of Mr. Clay in the senate succeeded a few days that of his friend John Quincy Adams, in the house, and failed to restore either of these gentlemen to my confidence on this question.

My sentiments on the bank question correspond with those heretofore expressed by Thomas Jefferson, in his letter of the 13th December, 1803, to Mr. Gillikin, as published by his grandnephew, in the 4th volume of his works, page 40, in which this great apostle of American liberty declares:

"This institution (a bank of the United States) is one of the most deadly hostilities existing against the principles and form of our constitution. The nation is, at this time, so strong and united in its sentiments, that it cannot be shaken at this moment. But suppose a series of untoward events should occur, sufficient to bring into doubt the competency of a republican government to meet a crisis of great danger, or to unshrink the confidence of the people in the public functionaries; an institution like this, penetrating by its branches every part of the union, acting by command and in phalanx, may, in a critical moment, upset the government. I deem no government safe which is under the vassalage of any self-constituted authorities, or any other authority than that of the nation, or its regular functionary. What an obstruction could not this bank of the United States, with all its branch banks, in time of war! It might dictate to us the peace we should accept, or withdraw its aid. Ought we, then, to give further growth to an institution so powerful, so hostile? That it is so hostile we know, 1st. From a knowledge of the principles of the persons composing the body of directors in every bank, principal branch, and those of most of the stockholders; 2nd. From their opposition to the measures and principles of the government, and to the election of those friendly to them; and 3rdly. From the sentiments of the newspapers they support.—Now, while we are strong, it is the greatest duty we owe to the safety of our constitution to bring this powerful enemy to a perfect subordination under its authorities. The first measure would be to reduce them to an equal footing only with other banks, as to the favors of the government. But in order to be able to meet a general combination of the banks against us in a critical emergency, could we not make a beginning towards an independent use of our own money, towards holding our own bank in all the depositories where it is received, and letting the treasurer give his drafts or notes for payment on any particular place, which, in a well-conducted government, ought to have as much credit as any private draft or bank note or bill, and would give us the same facilities which we derive from the bank?"

Such are the opinions of Mr. Jefferson in relation to this great question. He was against a bank of the United States, against the use of the state banks by the general government; was in favor of the divorce of bank and state, and in favor of the "independent use of our own money" through the medium of "treasury drafts," precisely as is now proposed in the bill for establishing an independent constitutional treasury. This much abused measure, originated then, not with Mr. Calhoun or Mr. Van Buren, but with Mr. Jefferson himself, upon whose advice and sanction, as well as upon principle, it has been adopted by the democratic party.

A bank of the United States being thus dangerous to public liberty, ought to be opposed, even if it promoted the security interest; but when the whole banking system, state and national, is shown to be daily injurious to our welfare, that it augments the price of all we purchase, and brings us no more money for our cotton (the price of that being regulated by the foreign market), why should we hesitate in opposing the whole system? A national bank is the great head of the system, declared by its friends to be indispensable to preserve and regulate the state banks and to maintain a paper currency. Be it so, and I am still opposed to such a bank, because I am against the whole paper system, against it as destructive of the morals, dangerous to the liberties, and ruinous to the true interests of the American people.

That the system is destructive of public morals, the proof is scattered throughout the union, from Michigan to Mississippi. The very foundation of banking institutions is based upon fraud and falsehood. It is based upon an authority to make promises that it is known must be broken, and to issue paper money at a ratio of from three to twenty per cent. over with the specie in their vaults; a promise to pay at all times upon demand all this money in gold or silver, which is known to be impossible of performance, if the holders of this money, as they have a right to do, present it for a redemption in specie. A promise to any individuals to do that which it is known cannot be done if its performance is required by the individuals to whom the promise is made, is a false promise, and a violation of good morals. Especially a promise by banks to a whole community, and which deeply involves their interest, should be regarded as of a character the most solemn, sacred, and obligatory, and never should be made, unless the fulfillment were certain. Let not this be confounded with a promise by an individual to make a payment at a future date, which promise he intends, when it is made, to perform, and believes he will be able to do so. It is not the intention of the banks to perform at all times their promises, for they know that it is impossible; that the specie is not in the country, nor can it be obtained, to pay all their notes at all times as they promise, on demand, in gold or silver; and to gamble and speculate upon the chances of the presentation of their notes for payment, is to convert paper banks into faro banks, and with infinitely greater hazard of loss to the community. The whole system, then, aims a fatal blow at private morality and at public virtue, and as a consequence must be destructive of all pure and sincere religion, for in the absence of virtue and morality, religion cannot exist, except in promises as false and hypocritical, as the promises of payment at all times in gold or silver, engraved on the face of bank notes.

If time allowed it, it might be shown inconceivably that instead of a promise of payment of bank notes in specie being founded on the gambler's calculation of chances, immoral as the gambler's calculation of chances would not be presented for payment beyond the ability of the bank to redeem them, it is, on the contrary, absolutely certain, according to the known rules of currency, that periods must occur from time to time, from the revolutions of trade, when these notes cannot be redeemed in gold and silver. This is proved by the failure of the Bank of France and of the Bank of England, though issuing but two to one, and of all the European banks similarly constituted, and of the American banks from time to time of every state in the union. We had general failures of our state banks in 1808, in 1814, in 1819, and in 1837. At two of these periods, 1808 and 1819, the Bank of the United States was in operation. In 1819 the Bank of the United States was itself reduced to the verge of bankruptcy, with but one dollar in specie to every one hundred in circulation, according to the official report of its president, and was only saved from insolvency, by turning upon the state banks for the redemption of their notes in specie, thus producing their failure, and the most universal and intense distress, and for the longest period of years throughout the country. In 1837, the Bank of the United States itself failed upon the notes of the old bank as well as of the new, though proclaimed by its president more powerful under the new than the old charter. All this abundantly proves, that though the American banking system, organized under the dominion of a Bank of the United States, may endure for periods averaging from five to fifteen years, yet even with this aid, the failure of the banks from time to time is certain; and consequently it is known by the banks, that their sacred and solemn promises to redeem all their notes at all times upon demand in specie could not be performed, and therefore that the promise never was otherwise than false and fraudulent. The whole system then being founded in fraudulent falsehood, what other results could be anticipated, than those which actually have occurred, and whatever oblivion might be extended to the past, a present determination to perpetuate the system, now that the facts are known, is a determination to banish pure morals, virtue and religion from the community, and as a consequence ultimately to overthrow our free institutions; for an immoral and corrupt people cannot permanently maintain a republican government. Especially is this result inevitable, if the government is compelled to unite its destiny with that of banks, by receiving and disbursing their fictitious promises of payment, and entrusting the public finances to their control and guardianship. Let us examine a few of the demoralizing effects of the system. Have we not seen the banks suspending with many millions of the public money in their custody as a sacred trust, and thus reducing the government to bankruptcy, by a refusal to make payment, when all of them had a people, and most of them a sufficient portion of specie, to have enabled them to liquidate at least this debt. Have we not seen them with considerable amounts of specie in their vaults, in direct violation of their solemn engagements, refusing the payment of their notes, and permitting them to depreciate from five to fifty per cent. in the hands of the people? Have we not seen them here distributing large dividends of alleged profits among their stockholders, in direct fraud of their creditors, to whom they were refusing all payment?

It has been officially proved that two of the banks of this state were started upon the same fictitious certificates of deposits from a bank that had failed, and that another was started by the fraudulent loan of $100,000 from a bank in a neighboring state, contracted to be returned, and actually returned, a few days after the bank went into operation, thus leaving it to proceed on its issues, with no capital whatever. Have not the banks, after an alleged redemption of specie payment, issued vast amounts of post notes, payable in six or twelve months, and have they not loaned out these notes at full value, and full interest, after they were known to have depreciated more than twenty per cent.? Do they not, although collecting full interest on all their debts, uniformly refuse all allowance of accruing interest on their post notes; and to avoid the payment of all interest, even at maturity, have they not repeatedly received these post notes on deposit, and then after the lapse of months, when these deposits were checked for, have they not refused to pay out the notes deposited on which the interest had accrued or others of a similar character, and compelled their creditors to take less valuable post notes of a later date, and payable at a subsequent period, and sometimes dated and filled up after the bank had failed all interest? Has not the community thus defrauded of the intervening interest, and in fact of all interest? If A should give his note to B for $100, dated January 1, 1839, B called upon A for the note, and he refused to deliver it, but handed him his note for the same, but dated 1st July, 1839, and payable at twelve months' date with six per cent. interest from date, would not A have defrauded B of six months' interest? And is not this the very thing now being done by many of the banks of this state? If we look at the manner, also in which the loans have been distributed by the banks of this state, the result must amaze every friend of equal rights and privileges. In the official report of the bank commissioners of this state to the legislature last year, it is stated in page 75 as follows: "It will be seen by an examination of the foregoing statement, that 203 directors of 21 banks own the entire circulation of the twenty-far banks." This, however, is only their immediate liabilities as payors of their own banks; but as they often have paper discounted for their benefit, without appearing liable either as principal or endorser, and many of them have extensive accommodations in each other's banks, we are unable to state the amount of bank credit used by these 203 directors." That 203 bank directors, in a population of near four hundred thousand, should monopolize by loans to themselves one-half the entire bank circulation of the state, is most manifestly unfair and unjust. Of the 22 banks examined by the commissioners, the directory had, as appears by their own returns, loaned to themselves as payors, three millions two hundred and forty thousand dollars, and were liable besides as endorsers in the same banks, for six millions nine hundred and eighty thousand, making an aggregate ascertained and admitted liability of the directory to their own banks only, of ten millions two hundred and twenty thousand dollars. But to this we must also add the liability of the directory in the three principal banks of this state, not examined, having an aggregate capital paid in of almost twelve millions of dollars. We have some date, however, as regards one of these banks in the report, namely, the affidavits of a former book-keeper and cashier of the Planters' bank, proving that four commission houses, whose names are given, and who were known to constitute in part the directory of this bank "were liable to the Planters' bank for two millions of dollars." Similar acts have been established as regards the Agricultural bank. As regards the Union bank, I have no report before me, or data from which to give any opinion respecting that institution. But from the data already furnished above, there cannot be the slightest doubt, that the directory of the banks of this state were indebted to their own banks at least the following amounts, as payors and discounters, including all notes discounted for their benefit, of six millions of dollars, and as endorsers were liable besides for ten millions of dollars, making an aggregate liability to their own banks of sixteen millions of dollars; and if to this we add the vast amount of their liability to other banks of this state in which they are not directors, the liability of the bank directory of this state to all banks of the state, on their own account cannot be less than eight millions, and as endorsers twelve millions, making an aggregate liability of the bank directory of this state, to the banks of the state, of twenty millions of dollars—being one-half the bank liability of the whole state, combined in less than two hundred and fifty directors. Similar facts as regards the monopoly of discounts by themselves and by commission merchants, are exhibited in the official statements of the Louisiana banks, believed in bank phrology to be among the soundest and best managed banks of the union.

By official communications made by a joint committee of both houses of the legislature of Louisiana, in December, 1837, and March, 1838, it appears that the liability of the bank directory (172 in number) of the sixteen banks of New Orleans to those banks, was, as reported by themselves, seventeen millions eight hundred and seventy-five thousand five hundred and ninety-two dollars; namely, as payors and discounters, $15,607,271, and as endorsers, $2,268,341; the total amount of all the discounts of the banks, being at the same time $32,407,170, exhibiting a bank liability of 172 directors in an amount about equal to one third of the bank liability of the whole population of Louisiana. We thus see the bank liability of a bank directory composed of 400 persons in two states, amounting to thirty-eight millions of dollars. From no other state have I any official returns on this subject, except from a single branch of one bank in Alabama, in which the liability of the directory of that branch to the bank was half a million of dollars. From what we have seen, however, in these three states, there cannot be a doubt, but that the total liability of all the directories to all the banks in the union, cannot be less than one hundred and fifty millions, or considerably more than one-fourth of the total liability to the banks, of the whole people of the United States.

Of all the evils of the banking system in the southwest, the greatest was the monopoly of discounts by commission merchants, by which the planter was compelled to pay the bank the usual interest, and additional premium upon exchange, and also, two and a half per cent. commission to the merchant for accepting at six months, and the same for advancing, by which the interest actually paid by the planter, becomes equivalent to at least eighteen per cent. per annum; and this, too, when this very expansion of the bank circulation was exacted from the planter a still heavier tribute, in the shape of augmented prices for provisions, and all the expenses of the plantation. If this state, with her most fertile soil and rich staple is now the most embarrassed of all the states of the union, most truly may we point to the banks as the great cause of all our calamities. Nor is it in the southwest only that are exhibited the ruinous and dismoraling effects of the banking system. No; these fatal consequences have been co-extensive with the existence of the system. Look at the ruin consequent upon the fraudulent failures of banks in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in New York and Boston; look at the wild catbanks of Michigan, as that fraudulent system has been justly designated, and at the corruption to be found every where accompanying the system. No; the demoralizing influences disappear in the career of the Bank of the United States. No; the history of the first three years of that institution is a history of acknowledged fraud, speculation and stockjobbing, abhorrent to every just and honorable precept. When Mr. Cheves became president of this bank, he reported these enormities to the nation, and that, on the 12th April, 1819, the bank had in its vaults but $71,522 of specie, and owed to the city banks a balance of $196,418, and its circulation was still $6,000,000," and the papers of the northern and middle states of that period draw a picture of a distress more intense and universal than that which now pervades Mississippi. Look at the history of expansions and contractions of this bank, expanding "more than ten millions in the course of a few months," and, by its official reports, contracting, "in the eight months, eight millions of dollars," and upwards; and concerning all business upon a perpetual lull, dependent upon the secret and constant changes of the policy of the Bank of the United States. Did not this very bank suspend in 1837, and, with an open declaration of its perfect ability to meet then all its engagements, did it not set its creditors at defiance for more than a year, and violate its solemn promises to redeem its notes at all times, upon demand, in specie. If a wealthy individual would dare thus, with ample means in his hands, to refuse the payment of his just debts, would he not be deemed pre-eminently in infamous? And have we already reached that point in the downward demoralizing tendency of the banking system, when a distinction in morals is attempted to be maintained, between the obligations of a bank and of an individual to perform promises to the utmost of ability so to do? And yet, such demoralizing apologies as these must be made, for the vice is inherent in the system, which perverts and encourages the making and circulation of promises false and deceptive, and just as before, and as after, a suspension; for there never is any thing but an appearance of an ability by a bank to redeem at all times, if presented, all its notes in specie—because it never has specie equal to its issues; and the suspension is but the proof of an inability which in fact, always existed. In truth, the condition of the banks, though apparently better under the dominion of the Bank of the United States, is in fact worse than in the absence of such an institution. Thus, if we look at the returns of the Planters' bank of this state, it will be found in a better condition within a week preceding to its suspension, than at any preceding period under the regulating power of a national bank. Thus, on the 6th November, 1833, its circulation was $1,437,873; its deposits $48,759; and its specie $113,137; and on the 27th April, 1837, its specie was $101,526 its circulation $1,539,597; its deposits $35,262; and its deposits in the name of the treasurer of the United States, $1,035,576. Thus in 1833, its circulation compared to its specie exceeded twelve to one, and its circulation and deposits combined exceeded its specie about sixteen to one. Now in 1837, its circulation exceeded its specie less than four to one, and its circulation and all its various deposits combined, exceeded its specie but six to one. In every respect, then, its condition was better in 1837, than in 1833, except the delusion created by the existence of the Bank of the United States. So if we look at the condition of the Bank of the State of Mississippi, on the 1st January, 1839, its specie was $77,665, its circulation $549,190, and its deposits $344,756, its circulation being to its specie as seven to one, and its circulation and deposits fourteen to one of its specie, thus exhibiting under the regulating power of a national bank, a much worse condition than that of the Planters' bank, on the 27th April, 1837. Yet to have doubted the ability of the State Bank of Mississippi in 1839, to redeem at once all its liabilities in specie, would have been considerably better, less than high treason, such is the phantasmagoric power of a national bank, to drive the specie for a time out of the banks and out of the country, and yet preserve an appearance of deceptive prosperity, till a convulsion comes, and the delusion vanishes. In fact, the most finished juggler that ever deceived an admiring audience, never performed his part with half the adroitness, as that which has distinguished the Bank of the United States, in substituting appearances for realities. And the same remark which is thus true as to the banks of Missisissippi, is true universally as regards the influence of the national bank in maintaining for a time, a large paper circulation, with but very little specie; the specie in the state banks, in the absence of a national bank even at the period of their failure during the terrible disasters of the war, being nearly as four to one. Thus the only effect of a United States bank is, to expel specie from the banks and from the country during its existence, and to blow for a moment the bubble of a delusive prosperity, till, from bringing on a demand for specie from abroad, and contending the inflated system, and down comes the ruin of the whole country. To recognize the system under the regulation of a national bank, is to bring on another short period of delusive prosperity, soon to be followed by terrible disasters. To resolve to create a national bank, is to compel the gradual winding up of the whole system, or at least, the reduction of its circulation to an extremely limited amount, and thus avoid the recurrence of future universal suspensions and convulsions.

Having proved the first branch of my position, the demoralizing effects of the banking system, it would follow as a consequence that these institutions are dangerous to public liberty. But that they are thus dangerous, is demonstrable by many other indisputable facts. The business of making all the money for a nation, is one of the highest attributes of its influence, and infinitely more important in all other governments, the diversified interests of society than in our own. The powers combined. Yet we seem not to have reflected that this gigantic power is entrusted exclusively to this gigantic stockholders of banks, state and national, and placed for a quarter of a century, by irrevocable charters, beyond the control of the people, or of their representatives. Nor is it only the transfer to these corporations of the power of making money, (not by labor or industry, but by stamping notes at the rate of a million in an hour, upon the face of a bank plate), but also the power of determining when, and how, and to whom, and in what quantities, and for what purposes, this money shall be loaned to any portion of the community, and when, and how, and from whom it shall be recalled. And to whom is this power entrusted? Is it to an impartial tribunal, acting openly, and removable by the people for an abuse of power? No: it is to an irresponsible directory, composed of stockholders of the banks, acting in secret conclave, and directly interested in abusing their power, interested in increasing their profits and dividends, by the expansion of their circulation, and interested in increasing the circulation by immense loans to themselves, monopolizing, as we have seen by the returns investigated, one-half the discounts of the banks, and concentrating in themselves in these two states, bank liabilities to the amount, as we have seen, of nearly forty millions of dollars. And how seen, of nearly forty millions of dollars. And how seen, of nearly forty millions of dollars? It was invested in property, to enhance the price of which, far beyond its real value, and enable the bank directory to sell at immense profits, new issues of paper money must be made, often, as we have seen, upon insufficient security, and again repeated to enable the purchasers to make payment. The power is sufficiently alarming when scattered among a thousand banks, but when it is proposed to consolidate it in a great central bank, to place under its control all the incorporated state banks, and to submit to its regulation (the regulation of all property, and of all labor, the power becomes fearful and tremendous, and in its practical effects upon all the transactions of society, incomparably greater than that of all the other powers delegated to the general government. And to whom are to be delegated all these fearful powers? To the directory of a corporation, created by an irrevocable charter, to endure for a generation; to a directory neither elected nor removable by the people or by their representatives, but chosen and removable only by a few incorporated stockholders, exercising, with closed doors and sealed lips, an authority over the rights and interests of the people, more arbitrary and despotic than any now entrusted to any European potentate. Talk not of the power and sovereignty of the states, or of the people, when such a power shall have been created. It will exercise a central power and authority, more unlimited and despotic, more disregarded by human abuses, and more arbitrary and uncontrolled than any of all the various banks of the union, except, by the last official returns, the hundred and twenty-five millions of dollars, upon which, exclusive of exchange and other shaving operations, is extracted, at the average rate of seven per cent, an annual interest of thirty-six millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, being an annual interest nearly equal to all the specie in all the vaults of all the banks of the union, what being at the last returns, $37,915,340; thus exhibiting an annual interest of one hundred per cent upon all the gold and silver held by the banks. And this vast and annually augmenting sum is collected, not by labor or industry, but by the non-producers from the producers. It is a tribute, exhausting the fountains of general prosperity, extorted by the few from the toil of the laboring millions. The unequal distribution of wealth is one of the great evils of human society, and so far as the just rights of property are involved, must be protected by every government. But still it is an evil, exhibiting squandering poverty by the side of pampered wealth, and never should be increased by governmental power. To prevent the increase of this evil, we have repealed the British laws of primogeniture and entailment, by which great wealth was perpetuated and consolidated in the hands of the few. But the banking system of incorporated and associated wealth will concentrate and consolidate in the hands of a few, with much greater rapidity than ever was accomplished by any system of an aristocracy that ever cursed the earth, by drawing off from the parched and withering soil the very springs and rivulets that should spread around abundant harvests, but that are taken from the suffering multitude, and concentrated in a few large streams and reservoirs, where the pampered few may luxuriate in all the more than splendid luxury of regal wealth and power. Fertile and productive as is yet the soil of the union, if this system is incorporated and concentrated, wealth endures and concentrates in the same ratio for another generation, it will, by its impoverishment of the many, and concentration of all wealth and power in the hands of the few, convert our this loved country into a more than Lybian desert, upon which vast and unwatered and unfertilized plains shall be seen, and the parched and perishing millions, the miserable wretch and remnant of what was once a flourishing nation, shall appear, as a green spot among the surrounding sands, where the incorporated few shall repose in all the greater wealth and sloth and luxury than ever disgraced the imperial court of the most effeminate despot. The amount of American bank stock is now estimated at about four hundred millions of dollars. If we estimate the other property of bank stockholders at an average of four times the amount of their stock, (and it is much greater in this state), the total amount of wealth of all the bank stockholders of all the banks of the union would be two thousand millions of dollars. Now, calculating the entire wealth of the union upon an estimate in proportion to the population, founded on the assessed values in this state, in which the most complete assessment is given, the entire wealth of the whole country would be greatly less than twenty thousand millions of dollars. Upon this estimate, then, a few bank stockholders, less than one to a hundred of our population, now hold one-tenth of the entire wealth of the whole country accumulated in one generation. What must be the result of another generation, if the system is re-organised (as is desired by the state banks with scarcely a dissenting voice) under the powerful dominion of a bank of the United States, with a capital of fifty millions? As the best managed banks, including the national banks, issue at least three to one of their specie capital, this, at an average interest of seven per cent, upon the paper loans, would be equal to twenty-one per cent per annum. Now, as the profits upon agriculture and labor are not more than an average of six per cent per annum, how long, then, at this more than triple rate of increase, would it take the incorporated wealth to accumulate more than one-half of the whole property of the nation? And as the fortunes of the few are augmented, must the many be impoverished? Who will then be these associated bankers, with all this vast and fruitfully accumulating wealth in their hands, and with all their great powers and exclusive privileges, would not soon constitute an aristocracy, more haughty, wealthy and powerful than any that ever ruled any portion of the earth? It would be, too, a splendid, indolent, luxurious, moneyed aristocracy, impelled by no feeling but that of avarice, and a desire for increase of dividends; elevated by no pride, however absurd, of birth or ancestry; animated by no recollection of their glorious deeds in the field or cabinet; stimulated by no patriotic impulse, by no lofty or generous ambition; the world, at its most corrupt age, would never have been disgraced and governed by such an aristocracy as that which is growing out of our banking system. Let them go for a few years more augmenting in power and wealth and numbers, and the commencement of the battle for liberty and deliverance will have been deferred too long. Perhaps even now the bugle notes of freedom—the cheering cry of onward! to the rescue of our rights and liberties is sounding too late along the ranks of the people. But let us never despair, if a nation of freemen can be roused to a sense of their danger; for even from the brink of the precipice, to which with viewless but rapid strides they seemed to hasten, they would turn back upon their oppressors, and upon the ruins of their system establish the great and fundamental principles of republican liberty.

Having, it is hoped, demonstrated the demoralizing effects and anti-republican tendencies of the banking system, the truth of either of these propositions should induce its own overthrow; but it is injurious as a mere question of finance to the true interests of the American people. The following classes combined, it will be conceded, constitute the large majority of the American people, namely: 1st, the exporting states; 2d, the manufacturing interest; 3d, the navigating interest; and 4th, the working classes, who live by the proceeds of their daily labor. The argument as to the cotton growing states, (and the same principle will apply to the growers of rice, tobacco, and all other exports) has been already exhausted. It has been clearly shown, that by the American bank paper system, the planter is compelled to give quadruple prices for all he buys, including provisions and all the expenses of cultivation, and receives no more for what he sells, than being governed by the foreign market. In relation to the manufacturer, the cost of his original investment is probably doubled by the paper system, as well as the expenses of conducting the establishment. Thus the cost of manufacturing is greatly enhanced, and a price is demanded for the domestic article, far above the price at which a similar article can be purchased from abroad, and the American manufacturer is thus too often ruined, or driven out of the market. But give the manufacturing states the benefit of a metallic currency, and the American can compete with the foreign manufacturer, and obtain the glorious result, of dispensing with all pretext for a protective tariff. As respects the great and important navigating interests, the price of material for building, the cost of construction, and of equipping and sailing vessels, has been so greatly enhanced by the paper system, as to produce of late a declining rate in the ratio of increase of American, as compared with foreign tonnage; and if steam, and the use of coal and machinery is to be introduced to a great extent in navigation, this great interest will be still more seriously depressed, in competition with foreigners, by the raising of the cost of the American vessels. And by the patriot and statesman it should never be forgotten, that the navigating interest is the only nursery of our navy, the great and glorious right arm of the nation's defence and honor. As to the working classes, the injury is great and appalling. The rents of their humble dwellings, and of every article they purchase, including provisions and all the necessities of life, are vastly increased by the paper system, whilst wages raise not in a correspondent ratio. It is settled law of currency, that wages is the last thing enhanced by paper issues, and nothing like a correspondent ratio with all other articles. If any doubt this, let them look at the vast increase of late of property in the great cities of Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York, in the midst of an overflow of bank paper. It is well known that many honest and industrious females there, are compelled to receive but ten cents a piece for making their daily and unremitting labors; and that many of the same females will not purchase for them the mere necessities of life, and that numerous humane societies have been formed there for their benefit, as well as that of the laboring poor generally. Nor is this the only way in which the working classes suffer from the paper system. Knowing but little of banks, upon their failure, the working classes generally hold an undue proportion of the worst paper, and numerous and distressing cases have occurred, in which the laboring poor, both men and women, have lost their little all, accumulated from years of toil and industry, by the failure of banks whose paper they held, or with which they had their funds deposited. I admire neither the head nor heart of that man, who has no sympathy or respect for those who live by daily labor, and by whose unceasing industry, so much is added to the wealth and products of the country. Surely the class should not be depressed by legislation, and the difficulties of subsistence enhanced by the paper system. Cheap lands and provisions increase the facilities of subsistence and augment most rapidly the prosperity and population of the country. In the great city of New York this question seems to be thoroughly understood by the working classes; they are the fixed enemies of the paper system, and with alternate victory and defeat, they have contended manfully against the bordes of bankers and speculators, brokers and stockjobbers in that great city. Let them persevere, and their ultimate victory is certain and triumphant. The exorbitant price of provisions is now universally felt and deprecated in the northern cities, and it is clearly chargeable to the paper system, not only directly in its vast enhancement of prices, but indirectly, in withdrawing so many thousands from agriculture, to invest their means in banking. The number in this country, of officers, clerks and agents, including also all bank stockholders who are withdrawn from agriculture to live in idleness upon bank dividends, is not to be less than eighty thousand, excluding the entire population of one of the states of this union. If these eighty thousand were engaged in agriculture, how greatly would it add to the products and actual wealth of the country, instead of producing nothing, and living upon the means extracted from the labor of others. This army of bank dependants is equal to many of the standing armies of Europe, and is maintained by a yearly tax upon the labor of the country equal to the entire revenues of the nation. The four hundred millions of capital invested in bank stock would, in the absence of banks, seek investment in commerce, agriculture or manufactures, or in great works of internal improvement, and thus give employment to labor, and increase the products and prosperity of the country; whereas it now draws its dividends from labor, and adds nothing, but subtracts much from the national wealth and industry. In the single case of the railroads in the union, including all their various market places, there must be invested at least thirty millions of dollars, a sum of money which would cover any state with rail roads, and canals, but which now for every useful purpose, might as well be sunk in the ocean. Nor should it be forgotten that the cost of making our roads and canals, and of removing obstructions from our navigable streams, is perhaps quadrupled by the paper system. Thus also the expenses of the governments, state and national, and of our country, and town and city corporations, are also at least doubled by an expanded paper currency; another item of loss, amounting to at least fifty millions of dollars per annum. If we take a look at the augmentation of the expenses of the British government, since the partial introduction there of the paper system, the ratio of increase will be amazing, and especially if compared with other European governments, where the currency is almost exclusively metallic. The opposition complain of the increased expenditure of the government in the union, by adding the contingent appropriation, (which never will be used) ten millions to defend the country in case of an invasion by England on the Maine boundary question; by adding five millions on account of the post office department, which pays for itself; and other expenses growing out of the Florida war and defence of the western frontier, they count up an appropriation of forty millions. This is all fallacious; but in so far as there is any actual increase of expenditure by the government, after allowing for the necessary addition arising out of our greatly augmented population, it is all justly chargeable to the opposition, as the advocates of the paper system. It is thus that the expenses of maintaining the army and navy, and all other national expenditures are more than doubled, by changing this from a hard money into a paper money government.— With the diminished expenditures of a hard money government, we might save our entire tariff and the proceeds of the public lands in favor of our settlers; with the augmented expenditures, arising from the paper system, we know not how soon an unjust demand may be made to increase the tariff and the price of the public lands. Nor should we forget, that the reunion of the banks, state or national, with the government, as the keepers of public money, renders the banking interest the great ally of the tariff. The public money being deposited with the banks, the greater the tariff and revenue and price of public lands, the greater will be the deposits in the banks, and the larger their profits. The average annual deposits of the government in the Bank of the United States without interest, was above six millions, all which they used and loaned at pleasure at the usual rate of bank interest. The greater the revenue then, the greater would be the profit of the bank, and if the veto of general Jackson upon the recharter of the government in 1832, and the veto upon the bank in 1832, had not occurred, the tariff party would have been unquestionably stronger in 1833, and that iniquitous system might have been perpetual.

Nor is it particular interests only that suffer by the paper system, but by it the balance of trade is constantly rendered more unfavorable to this country, by the great increase of the prices of imports and of all that is consumed here, whilst nothing more is obtained for our exports, that being governed by the foreign market. The great argument for the banking system, that it increases the prices of lands and plantations, is entirely fallacious. For whose benefit is this increase? Not for the benefit of the planter or farmer, but of the speculator only; for if the planter or farmer sell at high prices, they must give high prices when they purchase again—and the parent, who desires to purchase for his children farms and plantations, to begin the world upon, or any other person first becoming a planter or farmer, must pay a price vastly enhanced by the paper system. The great debtors of Mississippi were all to be ruined by abandoning the fact, for paper system. Directly the reverse is the fact, for the debts of the insolvent debtors must be chiefly paid by the net profits of cotton planting, which we have seen is vastly increased by the absence of paper money. Nor do we design to effect any very sudden revolution, for the specie clause of the sub-treasury bill went into operation only slowly and gradually, after the expiration of seven years, when it was supposed most existing debts would have been liquidated. Our object is to expel at once from circulation all bank paper except that payable at all times upon demand in specie, and gradually to abolish all bank notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars, and to fill up the vacuum with gold and silver. I do not hesitate, however, to avow it as my own wish and opinion, for which I only am responsible, (and not the party), that when this great reform shall have been accomplished, such will be the improvement in public morals, the augmented prosperity of the country, and increased vigor of republican principles, that we might in time proceed to the expulsion of all bank notes of a denomination less than one hundred dollars, and perhaps be enabled ultimately to dispense with the whole system; a system that was brought into existence less than two centuries ago, by government extravagance, that does not now exist in one-tenth of the nations of the globe, and that never did exist in the great and prosperous island of Cuba, within five days sail of our coast. Let us proceed then slowly and gradually, but firmly and fearlessly, with this great work, unterrified by the clamor of the banks that will resist all diminution of their power, and all decrease of their circulation and dividends; let us proceed by appeals to the judgment of the people, to act through the peaceful instrumentality of the ballot box. Let no inconsiderate haste or lawless violence mark our career, and above all, let us never violate the just rights of property or the sacred principles of the constitution. And especially let our war be upon systems, and not upon individuals. Ruinous as are the effects, demoralizing and anti-republican the tendencies, of the banking system, many honest but deluded men have been, and a few are still connected with the system. Let us ask all such men, guided by facts, and enlightened by experience, to review their opinions, and to unite with us in accomplishing the great reform of the banking system, now proposed by the republican party. In disavowing all personal hostility to the officers of banking institutions, I must not be considered as desiring to propitiate the favor of the banking interest. No; with my views and opinions, that is impossible; and, with the exception of one old and valued friend, whose long, ardent, honest and efficient support of the democratic party never should be forgotten, and who, I trust, will yet co-operate with us on this great question, I must expect from the banking and moneyed interest nothing but opposition, struggle and ardent. This opposition I must be prepared to encounter and combat, with becoming courtesy, and proper regard for the feelings and character of others, but when I shall cease to exercise that noble privilege of an American citizen, the right of expressing fully my opinions as heretofore upon all great public questions, I shall consider life as utterly worthless—and neither the concentrated opposition of the banking and moneyed power—nor the tongue of slander—nor the pen of calumny—nor threats of violence—nor dread of personal consequences, shall deter me from a zealous and fearless support, in and out of the senate, of all the principles avowed in this communication. It is a conflict for liberty, and although victory would be glorious in so good a cause, it would be glorious even to fall in such a struggle.

And to you gentlemen, the homage of a grateful heart, for your favorable opinions expressed in your letter, and your more than generous support and indulgent confidence will be remembered by me with affection and gratitude, till the last pulse of life shall cease to beat. Your friend and fellow citizen,
R. J. WALKER.

CHRONICLE.

A heavy account. The North American, a paper published at Swanton, Vt. contains a table setting forth the amount of property burned and pillaged by the troops and loyalists in Lower Canada, during the late insurrection. The following recapitulation exhibits the result:

Houses burned,	213
Houses demolished, (in St. Anthonye),	20
Barns, stables and other houses burnt,	380
Families plundered,	3,061
Total amount of property destroyed,	$819,217

The population of Pittsburg and its environs is estimated in "Harris' Directory" at 60,000, viz:

Native born Americans,	23,000
Irish,	10,000
German,*	12,000
English,	2,800
Welsh,	2,000
Scottish,	2,000
French,	700
African,	2,500

The Pittsburg Gazette thinks the above an exaggerated estimate, and that the error lies principally in the second and third items.

Theatrical criticism. Capt. Maryatt in his "Diary," gives the following as a specimen of American criticism; it is at least expressive: "Well, Abel, what d'ye think of our native genius, Mister Forest?" "Well, I don't go much to theatricals, that's a fact; but I do think he peeled the agony up a little too high in the last scene."

Amount of specie imported into New Orleans from foreign ports, for the week ending the 5th August, 1839, viz:

Silver,	$214,750
Silver bullion,	5,000
	$219,750

About five hundred youths have been enlisted since the passage of the law authorising the employment of apprentices in the navy of the United States. Two hundred and four of these have been placed on board of sea-going vessels.

The Great Western. Hunt's Merchant's Magazine for August contains an interesting table of the several passages of this noble steamer. From this table it appears that she has made seventeen passages from and to Bristol. The average of these passages from New York is 13.3-4 days. The shortest was 12-1-2 days; the longest 15 days. The average of the passages from Bristol was 16-1-2 days; the shortest 13 days, and the longest 21 days. The average of all the passages out and home, was 15 days. By one of the passages from New York to Bristol despatches by the ship were received in Liverpool and London on the thirteenth day after leaving New York, say on the evening of the seventeenth of October, having left New York, on the afternoon of the fourth of that month. By the same, and by one other passage, passengers and despatches reached Paris, by the way of England on the fifteenth day.

New England quarries. The stones of the Girard orphan college, are obtained from the marble quarries in Sheffield, Berkshire county, Massachusetts, and transported to the Hudson rail road. The blocks for the columns are of an average measurement of six feet in diameter, arc rounded and rough hewn at the quarry, and cost $120 a block when ready for transportation. The distance of land carriage is 24 to 26 miles.

Health of Trenton, N. J. As an evidence of the health of Trenton, we state the remarkable fact, that there has not been a burial in the Presbyterian churchyard, although the Presbyterian congregation is, excepting perhaps the Methodist, the largest in the city, since the 11th day of February, being nearly six months.

Trenton Gazette.

We have seen in the newspapers a great many foolish statements concerning the queen of England's household. The following is a list of the ladies about her majesty's person, with the amount respectively of their salaries which we publish for the information of those who are interested in such matters.

[Nat. Gaz.]

- Principal Lady of the bedchamber, marchioness of Normandy, 500l.
- Ladies of the bedchamber, Marchioness of Brandenburg, 400l. marchioness of Tavistock 500l. countess of Charlemont 500l. countess of Burlington 500l. Lady Portman 500l. Lady Littleton 500l. lady Barham 500l.
- Maids of honor. Hon. H. Pitt, 300l. hon. M. Dillon, 300l. hon. Miss Cooks, 303l. hon. Miss Cavendish, 300l. hon. M. Faget, 300l. Miss Murray, 300l. Miss Lister, 300l. Miss Spring Rice, 300l.
- Bed-chamber women. Lady C. Barrington, 300l. lady H. Clive, 300l. lady C. Copley, 300l. viscountess Forbes, 300l. hon. Mrs. Brand, 300l. lady Gardner, 300l. hon. Mrs. J. Campbell, 300l. Total $ 5,900l. sterling.

A great auctioneer. Mr. George Robbins, "through whose instrumentality half the landed property in England has changed hands," announces simultaneously, first 50,000 acres of land in America; then a villa and lands, with 1,500 acres, the favorite residence of Tuscany, and not far removed from Florence; then follows 600 acres of land in Brittany, especially adapted to successful emigration; and lastly, a little castle and 400 acres of land, approaching the vicinity of Athens. They indeed a new era in the vocation of an auctioneer.

Iron steamboat. We learn from the Pittsburg Gazette of Saturday, that the large iron steamboat now in progress of construction in that city will be launched in a few days. Her length, (the Gazette states), is about 145 feet, breadth of beam 25 feet, and depth of hold 6 feet. Her hull is composed entirely of iron.

Her bottom, sides and deck, are of sheets of iron, secured together by a heavy iron rivet; her ribs and beams are formed of strips of iron bent into this shape U, so as to give them stiffness and to permit the bottom and the deck sheets to be readily riveted to them. A water proof bulkhead extends through her whole length, and three similar bulkheads divide her length into four parts.

Her hold will, therefore, be divided into six compartments, and she will be water proof sheet iron bulkheads, thus rendering the sinking of the boat almost impossible. Her guards will also be composed exclusively of iron, so that her hull is entirely safe from fire. The whole frame of the deck is so well secured together as to give her very great stiffness and tenacity.

An eye to business. Meeting in our exchange papers the account we gave last week of the perilous adventure of Chapin and Robinson at the falls, reminds us of a circumstance connected therewith, which we had not time to narrate. After Robinson had been rescued, he reached the spot upon which Chapin was so providentially thrown, the two were observed by the anxious spectators to be very busy for some time among the underbrush which covers it. No human foot probably had ever before pressed the spot they stood upon, and though, while there, they were out of danger, escape seemed almost hopeless until their eyes were consequently watched with the greatest anxiety, while they were making preparations, as was supposed, for their fearful voyage. On landing, it was found they had brought with them a neat lot of trim canes. It is scarcely necessary to add that both are Yankees. Their cool courage and eye to the main chance sufficiently attest the fact.

American canoes in English vessels. We are informed that the Great Britain, just lately sailed, carried in English canoes, which was found not to answer the purposes of the ship, for one made by the Messrs. Wood & Co. of New York, and one of the same kind has also been ordered for the new steam ship building at Bristol. The American article costs much less, and is infinitely better calculated for the use of steam ships or packets than any of the kind that has been made on the other side of the Atlantic.

[Express.]

The revenue that accrued at the port of Boston, for the month ending the 1st inst, was $420,690, against $308,538 at the same period last year, and showing an increase of $127,160.

At Moscow there are 112 market places, with 3,584 shops, 2,505 other shops and warehouses, 89 dress makers' and mercers' shops, 11 fishermen, 70 hotels and inns, 14 coffee houses, 27 confectioners, 200 taverns, 10 eating houses, 239 wholesale wine merchants, 123 retail wine shops, 560 manufacturers, among which are, 405 for cotton goods, 54 for silks, 49 for linens, and 21 for woollens, 20 printing offices, of which 7 belong to the government, 12 lithographic engravers, 165 public carriages, 2,304 private coaches, 2,137 caddises, 229 phaetons, 10,229 Russian carriages, 13,343 sledges, 5,692 wagons. The club of nobles was visited last year by 15,227 persons, merchants club 30,411, English club 51,100, German club 101,755; the Russian theatre by 354,691, and the French theatre by 51,205.

Western traders. The Galena Gazette mentions the arrival there of four men from Seldrick's settlement, seven hundred and fifty miles northwest of St. Peter's. They are said to be intelligent half-breeds, and came on a trading expedition. They brought with them large quantities of dressed deer skins, worked mooseans, buffalo robes, dried buffalo meat, &c. besides a large number of beads and other articles of the latter was said at St. Peter's and Prairie du Chien.

Portsmouth stockings. The factory in this town, which is the largest existing in New England, is now in full operation. Last week, 3,000 pairs of woollen hose were completed. Constant employment is given to about 220 hands, in and about the factory. The spinning room is now in operation, and most of the yarn used is there spun. About a hundred pounds of wool are now spun and manufactured daily.

[Portsmouth, N. H. Journal.]

The lieutenant governor of Upper Canada has offered $2,000 reward for the apprehension of Lett, the alleged murderer of captain Usher, and also implicated in the late affair at Coburg.

The Liverpool Mercury states that gen. Skrzynecki, the heroic leader of the Poles during the last attempt of that brave people to obtain their independence, has been appointed to the command of the Egyptian army.

Fining a governor. A good joke is told of governor Doggs. By the ordinance of the city of Jefferson discharging a pistol within the city limits is punishable by fine. The governor broke this law and was hauled up before the mayor, and fined five dollars. The governor protested, contending that he had the power to remit the fine. The mayor denied this doctrine and said that about preparing a mittimus to lodge the governor in jail, when some of his friends forked over, and released the dignitary from "durance vile." As there is no precedent in the books, we commend this case to the attention of jurists. [St. Louis Republican.]

The silk bounty in Illinois, gives a premium of one dollar for every ten pounds of cocoons produced in this state—for every pound of reeled silk, a premium of one dollar. This privilege not to extend to bodies corporate and public.

Trinity church steeple. It is with extreme regret that we see the magnificent spire in progress of being levelled to the ground. It has stood far more than half a century, admired by strangers, and an object of pride to New Yorkers. This church was built soon after the great fire of 1788, which swept every building but one then standing on the west side of Broadway. It had been intended by the vestry to preserve the tower safe, and, in case of a pestilence, the whole so weak as to place in imminent peril, the lives of those who worshipped in that ancient temple of God. But on taking down the rear and side walls, it was discovered that the whole fabric must be pulled down, as the tower was not sufficient to sustain the spire. The consequence was that much against the will and wish of the vestry, they are compelled to prostrate the steeple. We are very much surprised that it is to be placed on its site, although there are but few worshippers left in that section of the city. Grace and St. Paul's are but thinly attended—one church will accommodate the whole. [N. Y. Times.]

Noble generosity. At a meeting of an association of the Methodist Episcopal church in the south, preparatory to celebrating the centennial anniversary of Methodism, and for the purpose of extending the interest of which it was to be applied to the support of superannuated ministers, their widows and orphans, and the cause of education; col. William C. Preston, whig member of the U. S. senate, from South Carolina, being one of the audience, rose in the congregation and briefly stated that he did not belong to the Methodist church, neither did any of his family, nor the father of which he was descended, he considered himself under peculiar obligations to that branch of the Christian church, it being mainly through the instrumentality of his grandmother, who was a sister of Patrick Henry and a member of the Methodist church, and had the charge of his education, that he occupied the station he now held in the United States, and when asked—Mr. Secretary put my name down for one thousand dollars, which was promptly done, and as promptly paid.

Agricultural. It is stated that Dr. Joseph E. Muse, of Cambridge, Maryland, has a field of 4 acres of corn, which will yield 105 bushels of shelled corn to the acre. He made 70 bushels to the acre last year.

A. T. H. Jones, esq. of Somerset county, Maryland, gathered this season, 561 4 bushels of wheat from 11-2 gillions sowing. It weighed just sixty pounds per bushel.

A relic of the olden times. We learn through the possession of a valued friend, that there is now in the possession of William Wainsley, of Byberry township, Philadelphia county, a pair of cart wheels, the hubs of which in his grand-father's time were surrounded by other felloes, and were pressed into service by the government, for the conveyance of troops and baggage in Braddock's western expedition.

After the defeat they were returned to the owner, (Wm. Wainsley's grandfather), and have remained in the family ever since. If the old hubs could speak, how would the spokes be astonished? What an interesting story they might tell of by-gone days, when the young Washington was fighting under the British flag and bravely protecting the haughty English regiments, who were galled by the American riflement? What revolutions have taken place since those old hubs first developed? There is certainly something interesting even in things inanimate, when their antiquity connects them with the olden time.

[Bucks County Intelligencer.]

There are four native Albinos in Springfield, Illinois. Two of them are lads, and they are quite indolent; the others are girls. The Springfield Journal says, that they have fine voices, and could they receive proper instruction, would make accomplished singers.

The editor of the Worcester Egis says, that he once knew an Albino in Connecticut, who was a singing master. Though young his hair and beard were as white as this paper, and his pink colored eyes were so delicate that he was obliged to keep them constantly covered by green glasses, or otherwise from strong light. He had a brother like himself in these respects.

By a recent statement in a Jamaica paper, it appears that that island contains 35,000 white inhabitants, 100,000 free colored, and 311,000 newly emancipated apprentices. There are 125,000 white and black, who can vote.

Travel. The London Spectator remarks, that 4,000,000 fewer persons travelled by stage coach in 1835 than 1836; and 15,400,000 more by railway in the same period.

*Some of the most intelligent German gentlemen think the population 13,000.
